track on two streets, with a right to lay a connecting track on any street between two intersecting streets which are known as the termini of its tracks, does not thereby acquire a right to lay a connecting track on either of the intersecting streets known as the termini. The word "between" excludes the termini. Philadelphia v. Citizens' Pass. Ry. Co., 10 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 16, 20.

Between 11 p. m. and 5 a. m.

A statute prohibiting the sale of liquor "between the hours of 11 o'clock p. m. and 5 o'clock a. m." means "the period intervening between 11 o'clock at night and 5 o'clock in the morning of the succeeding day. The statute contemplates reckoning forward the usual and natural way from 11 o'clock post meridian until 5 o'clock ante meridian, and this period necessarily begins in the night and terminates in the morning." Hedderick v. State, 1 N. E. 47, 51, 101 Ind. 564, 51 Am. Rep. 768.

BEVER.

The word "bever," which is the root of the word "beverage," means "a little repast between meals." In re Breslin (N. Y.) 45 Hun, 210, 217.

BEVERAGE.

See "Intoxicating Beverages."
Other beverages, see "Other."

Lexicographers give the primary meaning of the word "beverage" as "liquor to be drunk"; "drink"; and, though there are other meanings, all involve the proposition that it is a drink. In re Breslin (N. Y.) 45 Hun, 210, 213.

The use of liquor as a beverage does not mean simply that the same is to be drunk, but the word "beverage" is used to distinguish the act of drinking liquor for the mere pleasure of drinking from its use for medicinal purposes. Commonwealth v. Mandeville, 8 N. E. 327, 142 Mass. 469.

Webster's International Dictionary defines a "beverage," as a liquid for drinking; drink; usually applied to drink artificially prepared and of an agreeable flavor. Specifically, a name applied to various kinds of drink. For the judge, in charging the jury, to use the word "beverage," is in no sense an expression of opinion that the drink referred to is intoxicating. It is as proper to apply the word "beverage" to a cup of coffee or a glass of lemonade as to a glass of beer or whisky. Maddox v. State, 44 S. E. 822, 823, 118 Ga. 69.

Worcester defines "beverage" as "liquor to be drank; drink." Webster defines the word as "liquor for drinking." Hence an information charging the sale of whisky as a "beverage" is sufficient, under a statute making criminal such a sale "to be used as a beverage." The expression used implies a sale of the whisky to be drank; that is, to be used as a drink. People v. Hichman, 42 N. W. 1006, 1007, 75 Mich. 587, 4 L. R. A. 707.

In a statute providing that cider, when kept or deposited, with the intent to sell the same for tippling purposes, or "as a beverage," is intoxicating liquor, the expression "as a beverage" is synonymous with the words "tippling purposes," as commonly understood; but the phrase "tippling purposes," by its use in legislative enactments, has acquired a legal meaning restricting it to sales to be drunk on the premises, while the phrase "as a beverage," has no such restricted meaning, and must be construed as prohibiting the sale of cider as a beverage, whether sold to be used on the premises or elsewhere. State v. Roach, 75 Me. 123, 125.

BEYOND.

Under a statute providing that it shall not be lawful to fill in the waters of the port "beyond the bulkhead line," the authority is given to fill up to, but not beyond, such line. Williams v. City of New York, 105 N. Y. 419, 11 N. E. 829, 832.

BEYOND THE CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.

The words "beyond the Cape of Good Hope," as used in Act July 14, 1862, providing for the levy of a certain ad valorem duty on all manufactures of the growth or product of countries beyond the Cape of Good Hope, "when imported from places this side of the Cape of Good Hope," are employed as descriptive of the locality of certain countries, not of their relative position with respect to the port of import. They are used to avoid the necessity of designating the countries which lie east of the cape. "Beyond the cape" and "east of the cape" are often used in the acts of Congress as equivalent expressions. They indicate the locality of certain countries with reference to the position of the lawmakers at the national capital. Hadden v. Barney, 72 U. S. (5 Wall.) 107, 113, 18 L. Ed. 518.

BEYOND THE CAUSE.

There is a distinction between the action of a court in a cause which the court has no right to take, unless all the parties are before it, and the action of the court "beyond" the cause. If any parties to the suit have died, the cause must be revived, before the court can take any action in the cause. By "action beyond the cause" is meant those measures which are necessary for the execution of a decree which has been pronounced, and which are properly to be regarded as adopted, not in, but beyond, the cause, as founded on the decree itself, without respect to the relief to which the party was primarily entitled on the merits of the case. Crislip v. Cain, 19 W. Va. 438, 458.

BEYOND THE LIFE OF THE OFFENDER.

"Beyond the life of the offender," as used in Act 1862, providing for the confiscation of enemies' property, and declaring that no proceedings under the act should be so construed as to work a forfeiture of his real estate beyond the life of the offender, means that the proceedings for the condemnation and sale shall not affect the ownership of the property after the termination of the offender's natural life. After his death the land shall pass or be owned as if it had not been forfeited. It is not a forfeiture of the life estate only, or of the possession and enjoyment of the property for life. Wallach v. Van Rlswick, 92 U. S. 202, 208, 23 L. Ed. 473.

BEYOND A REASONABLE DOUBT.

See "Reasonable Doubt."

The phrase "proof beyond a reasonable doubt" is synonymous with the term "moral certainty." Woodruff v. State (Fla.) 12 South. 653, 658; Taylor v. Pegram (Ill.) 37 N. E. 837, 839 (citing Commonwealth v. Costley, 118 Mass. 1); Jones v. State (Ala.) 14 South. 772, 773; State v. Johnson, 91 Mo. 439, 442, 3 S. W. 863, 869.

BEYOND SEAS.

The term "beyond the seas," as used in statutes of limitation containing an exception in favor of persons "beyond the seas," has been held to mean "beyond or without the United States." Davie v. Briggs, 97 U. S. 628, 639, 24 L. Ed. 1086; Thurston v. Fisher (Pa.) 9 Serg. & R. 288, 291; Darling v. Meachun (Iowa) 2 G. Greene, 602, 603; Marvin v. Bates, 13 Mo. 217, 220; Fackler v. Fackler, 14 Mo. 432, 433; Ward v. Hallam (Pa.) 2 Dall. 217, 1 L. Ed. 355; Kline v. Kline, 20 Pa. (8 Harris) 503, 509; Keeton's Heirs v. Keeton's Adm'r, 20 Mo. 530, 543. A like construction was given to the term as used in the statute of wills. Mason v. Johnson, 24 Ill. (14 Peck) 159, 160, 76 Am. Dec. 740. The term does not include a person who, though without the state, is a resident of another state. Ward v. Hallam (Pa.) 1 Yeates, 329, 331; Ward v. Hallam (Pa.) 2 Dall. 217, 1 L. Ed. 355; Earle v. Dickson, 12 N. C. 16, 17; Whitlocke v. Walton, 6 N. C. 23, 24; Thurston v. Fisher (Pa.) 9 Serg. & R. 288; Pike v. Greene, 9 Tenn. (1 Yerg.) 465, 466. By another line of decisions, however, the term has been held to mean "out of the state." Richardson's Adm'r's v. Rich- ardson's Adm'r's, 6 Ohio (6 Ham.) 125, 126, 25 Am. Dec. 745; West v. Pickesimer, 7 Ohio (7 Ham.) 235, pt. 2; Denham v. Holeman, 26 Ga. 182, 183, 71 Am. Dec. 198; Murray's Lessee v. Baker, 16 U. S. (3 Wheat.) 541, 545, 4 L. Ed. 454. Or "beyond or without the limits of the state." Whitney's Lessee v. Webb, 10 Ohio, 513, 516; Smith v. Bartram, 11 Ohio St. 690, 691; Galusha v. Cobleigh, 13 N. H. 79, 87; Faw v. Roberdeau's Ex'r, 7 U. S. (3 Cranch) 174, 177, 2 L. Ed. 402; Stephenson v. Wait (Ind.) 8 Blackf. 508, 515, 46 Am. Dec. 489; Shelby v. Guy, 24 U. S. (11 Wheat.) 361, 366, 6 L. Ed. 495; Hulburt v. Merriam, 3 Mich. 144, 151; Shreve v. Whittlesey, 7 Mo. 473, 474; Mason v. Baltimore & O. R. Co., 32 Atl. 311, 313, 81 Md. 446, 29 L. R. A. 273, 48 Am. St. Rep. 524; Forbes' Adm'r v. Foot's Adm'r (S. C.) 2 McCord, 331, 332, 13 Am. Dec. 732. Or "beyond or without the jurisdiction of the state." Wakefield v. Smart, 8 Ark. (3 Eng.) 488, 489; Field v. Dickinson, 3 Ark. (3 Pike) 409, 414, 36 Am. Dec. 458; Bedford v. Bradford, 8 Mo. 233, 234; Bank of Alexandria v. Dyer, 39 U. S. (14 Pet.) 141, 145, 10 L. Ed. 391.

The term "beyond the sea," as understood by the judges of England, law writers, and Parliament, meant, prior to the union of the crowns of England and Scotland, out of the realm of England, and, after such union, signified out of the realm of Great Britain, including England and Scotland. Pancoast's Lessee v. Addison (Md.) 1 Har. & J. 350, 353, 2 Am. Dec. 520; Lane v. Bennett, 1 Mees. & W. 70, 75.

As used in St. 1821, c. 22, § 2, providing a penalty for transporting a minor out of the state to parts "beyond the sea" without the consent of his parent, master, or guardian, the term "beyond the sea" means some foreign port or place, and not merely another state. Campbell v. Rankins, 11 Me. (2 Fairf.) 103, 106.

The Massachusetts statute of limitations provided that the statute should not run against one "beyond sea, without any of the United States." It is held that a citizen of another state, who had never been within the commonwealth, was not a person "beyond sea, without any of the United States," as the words did not point out two distinct disabilities—one that of being beyond sea, and another that of being without the United States. Whitney v. Goddard, 37 Mass. (20 Pick.) 304, 308, 32 Am. Dec. 216.

BIAS.

Actual bias, see "Actual Bias."

Bias, according to Webster, is a leaning of the mind; propensity or prepossession toward an object or view, not leaving the mind indifferent; bent; inclination. Mitchell v.

State, 36 S. W. 456, 464, 36 Tex. Cr. R. 278; Gulf, C. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Gilvin (Tex.) 55 S. W. 985, 986. The term is so used in Code Cr. Proc. Tex. art. 636, subd. 12, providing that a bias in favor of a defendant is as much a cause for challenge as a prejudice against him. Withers v. State, 17 S. W. 936, 30 Tex. App. 383. And in Comp. Laws S. D. § 5040, referring to "bias" as a disqualification of a juror. Haugen v. Chicago, M. & St. P. Ry. Co., 53 N. W. 769, 771, 3 S. D. 394.

Anderson says, "Bias in a juror is being under an influence which so sways his mind to one side as to prevent his deciding the cause according to the evidence." Haugen v. Chicago, M. & St. P. Ry. Co., 53 N. W. 769, 771, 3 S. D. 394.

Bias is that which sways the mind toward one opinion rather than another. Olive v. State, 11 Neb. 1, 23, 7 N. W. 444, 450. It is "anything which turns a man to a particular course, propension, inclination." One whose opinion is preconceived and expressed is inclined to that side, and some evidence is necessary before these impressions can be removed and his mind restored to the straight line of indifference. Thus, though a juror may have no ill will toward the accused, if he has formed and expressed an opinion as to his guilt, his mind has a bias resting on it. Hudgins v. State, 2 Ga. (2 Kelly) 173, 176.

A juror who has a fixed opinion as to the guilt of an accused, though formed from hearsay, is incompetent to try the case, on the ground of bias. Maddox v. State, 32 Ga. 581, 587, 79 Am. Dec. 307.

A juror who testified on his voir dire, "It is a fact that I have a feeling in this case; would go into the jury box with a feeling towards one of the parties to the suit;" and explained what he meant by "feeling" by saying, "Well, it is a kind of friendly feeling I have towards a man; a kind of sympathy I have; something like that, I suppose"—was disqualified, within the meaning of Rev. St. art. 3141, providing that a person shall be disqualified in any case to serve on the jury who has a bias or prejudice in favor of or against either of the parties. Gulf, C. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Gilvin (Tex.) 55 S. W. 985, 986.

The word "bias," as used in Code Cr. Proc. art. 636, prescribing as cause for the challenge of a juror that the juror has a bias in favor or against defendant, means a leaning of the mind, not leaving the mind indifferent. A juror who testified that he had known defendant and had had business transactions with him for years past, and that he liked defendant, and would dislike very much to find him guilty, showed bias in favor of defendant, warranting the court in excluding him as a juror. Pierson v. State, 18 Tex. App. 524, 558.

As to the question of bias the court instructed the jury as follows: "'Bias' means a leaning or inclination towards or against the accused. You will be asked whether or not your mind is perfectly impartial between the state and the accused; that is, whether the juror is perfectly perpendicular between the state and the accused—whether he is in such a condition as to be swayed the one way or the other by the testimony." Hinkle v. State, 21 S. E. 595, 601, 94 Ga. 595.

Prejudice distinguished.

"Bias" and "prejudice" are not synonymous terms. "Prejudice" is defined by Webster as to prepossess with unexamined opinions, or opinions formed without due knowledge of the facts and circumstances attending the question; to bias the mind by hasty and incorrect notions, and to give it an unreasonable bent to one side or other of a cause. Bias is the leaning of the mind, inclination, prepossession, propensity towards some person or object, not leaving the mind indifferent. If the opinion formed by a juror be such as to bias or prejudice his mind, he should not be sworn. State v. Barton, 71 Mo. 288, 296.

"Bias" is a particular influential power which sways the judgment—the inclination of the mind toward a particular object—and is not synonymous with "prejudice." A man cannot be prejudiced against another without being biased against him, but he may be biased without being prejudiced. Willis v. State, 12 Ga. 444, 449.

BICYCLE.

Bicycles were invented as early as 1819. The form in which they were first made resembles their general appearance to-day, the material differences being in the manner of propulsion. At first they were driven by striking the feet of the rider against the ground. Now they are propelled by the action of the feet of the rider upon pedals attached to a crank over which a chain runs, connecting the rear wheel. In 1869 the present principle of locomotion was adopted. At that time the relative size of the two wheels was changed, so that one was many times larger than the other. Now, however, the change in the size of the wheels has been abandoned, and the original equality in that respect restored. When first used they were termed "velocipedes." Shortly afterwards the term "bicycle" was universally adopted. Both terms are treated as convertible by the lexicographers, and are defined as a light vehicle or carriage. State ex rel. Bettis v. Missouri Pac. Ry. Co., 71 Mo. App. 385, 390.

A bicycle is a vehicle now used very extensively for convenience, recreation, pleasure, and business, and the riding of one on a public highway in the ordinary manner, as the same is now done, is neither unlawful nor prohibited; nor can a person whose horse is frightened by one object to their use on the street because they are not ancient vehicles, nor used in the Garden of Eden by Adam and Eve. Thompson v. Dodge, 60 N. W. 545, 546, 58 Minn. 555, 28 L. R. A. 608, 49 Am. St. Rep. 533.

The terms "bicycle" and "tricycle," as used in the section relating to bicycle riding, shall be deemed to include all vehicles propelled by the person riding the same by foot or hand power. Gen. St. Conn. 1902, § 2061; Rev. Laws Mass. 1902, p. 531, c. 52, § 12.

The terms "bicycle" and "tricycle," as used in the act regulating the use of highways, etc., shall be deemed to include all vehicles propelled by the person riding the same, either wholly or in part. Pub. St. N. H. 1901, p. 256, c. 93, § 2.

The word "bicycles," as used in an act relating to bicycle paths, shall be deemed to include bicycles, tandems, quads, etc. A bicycle is a vehicle propelled by a rider by foot power. Ann. Codes & St. Or. 1901, § 4876.

As a carriage or vehicle.

See "Carriage"; "Vehicle."

As a tool.

See "Tools—Tools of Trade."

Tricycle included.

A tricycle, not being a bicycle, or known by the general term "bicycle," does not come within the provisions of an ordinance prohibiting the use of sidewalks by all varieties of vehicles known by the term of "bicycle." Wheeler v. City of Boone, 78 N. W. 909, 910, 108 Iowa, 235, 44 L. R. A. 821.

BICYCLE PATH.

A bicycle path is a highway for bicyclists and pedestrians. Ellis v. Frazier, 63 Pac. 642, 644, 38 Or. 462.

BID.

See "Unbalanced Bid"; "Upset Bid."

Where a bond guaranties the carrying out by a third party of his "bid" for carrying the mail, the word "bid" means contract. Carr's Ex'r v. Wyley, 23 Ala. 821, 825.

As offer to purchase.

"A 'bid' means an offering of so much money for the property exposed for sale, not the mere verbal saying of the party that he will give so much." State v. Johnston, 2 N. C. 293, 294.

"A bid at an auction is but an offer to purchase." It does not constitute a contract until it is accepted, and hence may be withdrawn before such acceptance. United States v. Vestal (U. S.) 12 Fed. 59.

At auction a bid is nothing more than an offer on one side, which is not binding on either side until it is assented to. The bid does not complete the contract, because the party selling is not bound by the bid, but may, in case of a higher bid, sell to another; and, where there is no acceptance by one of the parties, the contract is not complete. Paine v. Cave, 3 Term R. 148, 149.

In its comprehensive sense, bidding is making an offer, but in its more ordinary acceptation it signifies the making of an offer at an auction. Bouv. Law Dict. One is said to bid off a thing when he bids at an auction, and the thing is knocked down to him in immediate succession to the bid, and as a consequence of it. The expression "bidding off" a contract at public letting would manifestly be perverted in using it for the description of a transaction in which proposals were made and privately passed on, uncontrolled by the consideration of the lowest bid. If a private gentleman should advertise for proposals to do a work, and, after receiving the proposals, should, in the exercise of his discretion, award the contract to one of the proposers, no one would say that the contract had been bid off at a public letting. Eppes v. Mississippi, G. & T. R. Co., 35 Ala. 33, 56.

Sale implied.

Under a statute requiring the commissioners of a school fund to sell forfeited mortgaged premises to the highest bidder, and requiring the commissioners, if no one will bid the full amount, to bid on the same on account of such fund, the word "bid" seems to imply that there is to be a sale; and the object requiring the commissioners to bid is to enable them in all cases to make a sale, and thus cut off the mortgagor's equity of redemption. Krebs v. Dodge, 9 Wia. 1, 11.

BID OFF.

One is said to bid off a thing when he bids it in at auction, and the thing is knocked down to him in immediate succession to the bid, and as a consequence of it. Eppes v. Mississippi, G. & T. R. Co., 35 Ala. 33, 56.

The bidding off of property at a tax sale by the treasurer in the name of the county and for the county is a sale. The county, when it bids off property at a tax sale, becomes a purchaser, and does not simply bid off the property and hold it until some one pays the taxes and penalties thereon, and takes an assignment of the bid from the county. Doudna v. Harlan, 25 Pac. 883, 885, 45 Kan. 484.

BIDDER.

See "Best Bidder"; "Highest Bidder"; "Lowest Bidder"; "Lowest Responsible Bidder"; "Responsible Bidder."

Under a statute providing for the sale of certain property to the highest bidder making sealed proposals, persons filing proposals offering to pay a fixed sum over and above the highest bid of the highest responsible bidder are not within the meaning of the act. Webster v. French, 11 Ill. (1 Peck) 254.

BIENES.

The term "bienes" appears to be of comprehensive import, and includes all things, not being persons, which may serve for the uses of man. It may perhaps be rendered by the word "property," and, as used in an order reciting "los bienes pertenentes a las misiones," would seem to refer to those cultivated lands, orchards, etc., and other appurtenances, such as houses, workshops, utensils, etc., belonging to the missionaries. Larkin v. United States (U. S.) 14 Fed. Cas. 1150, 1154.

BIENES COMUNES.

"Bienes comunes are those things which, not being as to property of any, pertain to all as to their use—as the air, rain, water, the sea, and its benches. Escrache." Lux v. Haggin, 69 Cal. 255, 315, 10 Pac. 674, 707.

BIENES GANANCIALES.

"Bienes gananciales" is the term under which Escrache, in his dictionary, treats of the respective rights of the husband and wife in the property held by them; and he says that among bienes gananciales are not considered those which the consorts had at the time of contracting the marriage. Welder v. Lambert, 44 S. W. 281, 284, 91 Tex. 510.

BIENES PUBLICOS.

"Bienes publicos are those which, as to property, pertain to the people or nation, and, as to their use, to the individuals of the territory or district, such as rivers, shores, ports, and public roads. Escrache." Lux v. Haggin, 69 Cal. 255, 315, 10 Pac. 674, 707.

BIENNIAL.

"The word 'biennial' is derived from the Latin words 'bis,' twice, and 'annus,' year, meaning the happening or taking place of anything once in two years." State ex rel. Shields v. Smith, 42 Mo. 506, 507.

BIENNIALLY.

Where a mayor is required to biennially appoint certain ministerial officers which are named, the word "biennially" evidently and beyond any question has reference to the time of the appointment, and signifies that the mayor then and there, immediately on his accession to office, shall make the appointment. People v. Kilbourn, 68 N. Y. 479, 482; Same v. Tremain (N. Y.) 9 Hun, 573, 576 (affirmed 68 N. Y. 628).

BIENS.

The Norman French term "biens" is said to include property of every description, except estates of freehold. Lord Coke says "goods, biens, bona, includes all chattels as well as real and personal." McCaffrey v. Woodin, 65 N. Y. 459, 469, 22 Am. Rep. 644 (citing Co. Litt. 118b).

Bouvier, in his Law Dictionary, defines the French word "biens" to mean "property of every description, except estates of freehold and inheritance." But this is evidently the strict meaning which it has as it is defined by the common-law writers, because, immediately after this definition, he adds these words: "In the French law this term includes all kinds of property, real and personal. Biens are divided into biens meubles, movable property, and biens immuebles, immovable property." It would thus appear that the word, as used in the French language, has a meaning in the civil law which includes both real and personal property. In a note to section 13, Story, Conf. Laws (8th Ed.), it is said: "The term 'biens,' in the sense of civilians and continental jurists, comprehends not merely goods and chattels, as in the common law, but real estate." It is also said in a note to section 146 of the same work: "Foreign jurists, commonly, in the term 'biens,' include all sorts of property, movable and immovable, in their discussions on this subject" Adams v. Akerlund, 168 Ill. 632, 639, 48 N. E. 454, 457 (citing Bouv. Law Dict.).

BIGAMY.

The word "bigamy" signifies, as its derivation clearly indicates, being twice married. According to the canonists, bigamy consisted in marrying two virgins successively, one after the death of the other, or in once marrying a widow. By a corruption of the meaning of the term bigamy is now understood, in law, to be the state of a man who has two wives, or of a woman who has two husbands, living at the same time. Commonwealth v. McNerny (Pa.) 10 Phila. 206, 207, 31 Leg. Int. 172.

It is said in Bacon's Abridgment that "bigamy" is the having a plurality of wives, and that the offense consists of marrying a second wife, the first being alive. Bouvier defines it to be the state of a man who has two wives, or of a woman who has two husbands, living at the same time. Blackstone says, "It is the having a plurality of wives at once." Act March 31, § 34 (P. L. 392), defines "bigamy" as, "If any person shall have two wives or two husbands at one and the same time." Gise v. Commonwealth (Pa.) 2 Wkly. Notes Cas. 589; Gise v. Commonwealth, 81 Pa. (31 P. F. Smith) 428, 430. It is a statutory, and not a common-law, crime. It was not an offense at common law to marry a second time during the life of the first husband or wife, but it was a canonical offense. "Bigamy," says Horton in his work on Criminal Law, "is committed by a party who, when legally married to one person, marries another." Niece v. Territory, 60 Pac. 300, 302, 9 Okl. 535.

Bigamy is the marrying by a person who has a husband or wife living. Scoggins v. State, 32 Ark. 205, 213. It is the having of two wives or two husbands at the same time. Commonwealth v. Grise (Pa.) 11 Phila. 655. As defined by the Code, it is knowingly having a plurality of husbands or wives at the same time. Nelms v. State, 10 S. E. 1087, 84 Ga. 466, 20 Am. St. Rep. 377.

The one who contracts a second marriage before the dissolution of the first is guilty of bigamy, and hence an indictment charging that defendant was married, and, while married and undivorced, knowingly and unlawfully married one named in the indictment, the indictment sufficiently charges the offense of bigamy, though it was not named in the indictment. And the word "bigamy," as used in the statute denouncing the offense, is used in its universally understood meaning, so that a description of the offense would not express more than the word itself. State v. Hayes, 29 South. 937, 938, 105 La. 352.

Sexual intercourse.

Bigamy is the marrying by one person who has a husband or wife. The offense is completed at the time of the marriage, without any subsequent cohabitation. Beggs v. State, 55 Ala. 108, 111.

Under Cr. Code 1896, § 4406, providing that, if any person having a former husband or wife living marries another, or continues to cohabit with such second husband or wife in this state, he or she shall be guilty of bigamy, the crime is committed by living under the same roof and acknowledging each other as husband and wife, though the parties may be physically incapable of having sexual intercourse. Cox v. State, 23 South. 806, 117 Ala. 103, 41 L. R. A. 700, 67 Am. St. Rep. 166.

BIGAMIST.

Any man is a polygamist or bigamist, who, having previously married one wife, still living, and having another at the time when he presented himself to claim registration as a voter, still maintains that relation to a plurality of wives, although from the date of the passage of the act of March 22, 1882, c. 47, 22 Stat. 30 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3633], until the day he offers to register and vote, he may not, in fact, have cohabited with more than one woman. Cannon v. United States, 6 Sup. Ct. 278, 287, 116 U. S. 55, 29 L. Ed. 561 (citing Murphy v. Ramsey, 114 U. S. 15, 5 Sup. Ct. 747, 29 L. Ed. 47).

BIGAMOUS COHABITATION.

The bigamous cohabitation prohibited by the Edmunds act for the prevention of bigamy in Utah is the pretending or making show to the outside world of keeping up the polygamous or bigamous relations. United States v. Snow, 9 Pac. 686, 687, 4 Utah, 295.

BIG WITH CHILD.

"Big with child" is equivalent to "quick with child." State v. Cooper, 22 N. J. Law (2 Zab.) 52, 55, 51 Am. Dec. 248.

BIJOU.

"The term 'bijou' which seems to be very nearly analogous to the English word 'jewelry,' is defined to be a little work of ornament, valuable for its workmanship or by its material." Commonwealth v. Stephens, 31 Mass. (14 Pick.) 370, 373 (quoting Dict. de l'Acad.).

BILATERAL.

Having two sides; arranged upon two sides; affecting two sides or parties. Webster.

BILATERAL CONTRACT.

A "bilateral contract" consists of mutual promises to do some future act. If the consideration for a promise is another promise, the whole agreement may be contingent, to come into effect only at the will of one of the parties. Montpelier Seminary v. Smith's Estate, 38 Atl. 66, 69 Vt. 382.

BILATERAL RECORD.

A record is bilateral when introduced between parties and privies, and, when so, cannot be disputed. Colligan v. Cooney, 64 S. W. 31, 33, 107 Tenn. 214.

BILGE.

A vessel is bilged, in the nautical sense of the phrase, as well as in the opinion of lexicographers, where the water is freely admitted through holes and breaches made in the planks of the bottom, occasioned by the injuries, whether the ship's timbers are broken or not. Peele v. Merchants' Ins. Co. (U. S.) 19 Fed. Cas. 98, 103.

"Bilging," as used in a policy of marine insurance providing that the assurers are not liable for any partial loss unless the damage happens by straining or "bilging," means a breach in the vessel. Where a vessel was very much strained, and her seams opened and let in water, but there was no actual breach of a plank in the ship, there was not a bilging. Ellery v. Merchants' Ins. Co., 20 Mass. (3 Pick.) 46, 47.

BILL

All bills, see "All."

The word "bills," in Kingston City Charter (Laws 1872) c. 152, § 34, providing that it shall be the duty of the mayor to approve or disapprove all bills, orders, resolutions, or ordinances, etc., does not refer to the claim or claims against the city for services rendered or materials furnished, but refers to something in the nature of a legislative act, and therefore the mayor has no authority to veto a part or a single item of a resolution of the city approving and auditing money claims against it. "If the construction contended for by the learned corporation counsel is correct, and the word 'bills' relates to claims against the city, the veto or disapproval of the mayor would be a finality, as the common council has nowhere authority to reconsider the action of the mayor in disapproving bills; so that a bill against the city, disapproved of by the mayor, would stay disapproved of, so far as the common council are concerned. It cannot, I think, be successfully contended that the Legislature ever intended to thus submit honest claims against a municipality to the pique, prejudice, or honest mistake of any mayor." Cloonan v. City of Kingston, 75 N. Y. Supp. 425, 426, 37 Misc. Rep. 322.

In commercial law.

See "Duebill"; "Freight Bill"; "Hand-bill."

"Bill," as used in a contract for the sale of coffees, providing that the sellers agree to "bill" cordova coffee at the same price f. o. b. Pittsburg as certain other companies, is not synonymous with "deliver." Dannemiller v. Kirkpatrick, 50 Atl. 928, 929, 201 Pa. 218.

Same—As an account.

"Bills," as used in Pub. Laws, providing that the amount received from the sale of certain scrip is appropriated for the payment of bills audited by a certain board, and the state auditor is authorized to draw his order upon the general treasurer for the payment of all bills out of the amount so received, should be construed in its primary signification of an account for goods sold, services rendered, or work done, with the prices or charges annexed, though it is doubtless applied often in public speech to the statement of a claim in gross as well as by items. In re Statehouse Bills, 35 Atl. 212, 19 R. I. 390; In re State House Commission (R. I.) 33 Atl. 453, 454.

The word "bill," as used in Rev. St. § 833, relating to the forgery of a bill and bill of exchange, is not used in the sense employed by lexicographers, as conveying an account of charges and particular indebtedness by the creditor to his debtor. The word "bill" is qualified by the words "of exchange." State v. Murphy, 46 La. Ann. 415, 419, 14 South. 920.

Same—As bank bill or note.

The word "bills," when used as a subject or medium of payment, means bank notes of some description. Jones v. Fales, 4 Mass. 245, 252.

A note payable in "York State bills or specie" is the same thing as being made payable in lawful current money of the state, for the bills mentioned mean bank paper, which is here, in conformity with common usage and common understanding, regarded as cash. Keith v. Jones (N. Y.) 9 Johns. 120, 121.

A bank bill or currency bill, when spoken of as money, is usually called a "bill," without adding the words "bank bill" or "United States currency bill." Thus, when the words "one $5 bill in money" are used to designate it, we understand that a paper bill of the denomination and of the value of $5, a circulation medium which passes as money, is meant. An indictment charging the theft of a $5 bill in money is a sufficient description of the stolen property, without reciting that it is a bank bill or paper currency money of the United States. Green v. State, 13 S. W. 784, 785, 28 Tex. App. 493.

Same—As bill of exchange or single bond.

A bill is a common engagement for money, given by one man to another, being sometimes with a penalty, called a "penal bill," and sometimes without a penalty, then called a "single bill," although the latter is most frequently used. By a "bill" we ordinarily understand a single bond without a condition. Tracy v. Talmadge (N. Y.) 18 Barb. 456, 462; Tracy v. Talmadge (N. Y.) 9 How. Prac. 530, 536; Briscoe v. Bank of Kentucky, 36 U. S. (11 Pet.) 257, 328, 9 L. Ed. 709; Tracey v. North American Trust & Banking Co., 12 N. Y. Leg. Obs. 303, 306.

A "bill" is an order drawn by one person on another to pay a certain sum of money absolutely and at all events. The order cannot be paid out of a particular fund, but must be drawn on the general credit of the drawer, though it is no objection, when so drawn, that a particular fund is specified from which the drawee may reimburse himself. Munger v. Shannon, 61 N. Y. 251, 255 (cited and approved in Schmittler v. Simon, 5 N. E. 452, 454, 101 N. Y. 554, 54 Am. Rep. 737).

Swan's St. 1877, entitled "An act for the relief of sureties and bail in certain cases," provides that when any person shall become bound as surety by bond, bill, or note for the payment of money or other valuable thing, and shall apprehend that the principal debtor is likely to become insolvent or remove from the state, such surety, if a cause of action shall have accrued, may forthwith put such bond, bill, or note in suit, and that, unless the creditor within a reasonable time commence an action on the bond, bill, or note, the surety shall be released from liability. Held, that the word "bill" means bill of exchange and not a single bond. Ohio Life Ins. & Trust Co. v. McCague, 18 Ohio, 54, 66.

As used in the negotiable instruments law, "bill" means bill of exchange. N. D. Negotiable Instruments Law, § 191; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 1060. The word "bill," as used in the negotiable instruments act, means bill of exchange. Ann. Codes & St. Or. 1901, § 4592. The term "bill," as used in the negotiable instrument law, means bill of exchange. Rev. Laws Mass. 1902, p. 653, c. 73, § 207. "Bill," as used in the negotiable instruments law, means bill of exchange. Code Supp. Va. 1898, § 2841a. As used in the chapter relating to negotiable instruments, "bill" means a bill of exchange. Bates' Ann. St. Ohio 1904, § 3178.

Same—Bond.

Instruments issued by a corporation by which it declares itself to be held and firmly bound to pay W. M. or his assigns, on a day certain, a specified sum, with interest payable semiannually on the presentation and delivery of certain warrants therefor, which were annexed to the obligation, and provided that, upon complying with certain conditions therein specified, the holder of the instrument should become entitled, in lieu of such sum, to a specified amount of the capital stock of the company, are not bills or notes within the meaning of the safety fund act, prohibiting moneyed corporations from issuing any bills or notes unless the same should be made payable on demand and without interest. Leavitt v. Blatchford, 17 N. Y. 521, 539.

Same—Draft.

The words "bill or note," in a statute providing that no banking association shall issue or put in circulation any bill or note, etc., mean any circulating bill or note, deposited and likely to be used as a substitute for money. The terms do not include a draft, not payable by its terms to order or bearer, although expressed in dollars and not in foreign coin, and drawn on a domestic, and not a foreign, place. Curtis v. Leavitt, 17 Barb. 309, 341.

A postdated draft taking effect by delivery is a time draft, and within the meaning and intent of the statute against like bills and notes, declaring that no banking association or individual banker, as such, shall issue or put in circulation any "bill or note" of such association or individual banker, unless the same shall be made payable on demand and without interest. Oneida Bank v. Ontario Bank, 21 N. Y. 490, 494.

Private bill, see "Private Act."

Perhaps as accurate a definition of a "bill" as can be found is that given in Webster's dictionary: "A form or draft of a law presented to a legislature, but not yet enacted, or before it is enacted; a proposed or rejected law." "In some cases, statutes are called 'bills'; but usually they are qualified by some description, as a 'bill of attainder.' 'Bills' and 'acts' are sometimes used as synonymous terms." Cushing, § 2025. The definition of a bill as given by Webster is that usually accepted and acted upon. The idea conveyed by the word "bill" is different from that conveyed by the word "resolution." Bills may originate in either house, except revenue bills. Const. § 17. A bill must be read by sections on three different days, etc. Const. § 18. A joint resolution of different sections, doubtless, may be passed on one reading. May v. Rice, 91 Ind. 546, 549.

In a technical sense, the term "bill" is applicable properly to the enactment as a whole. Although the technical sense of words should prevail, where not inconsistent with the clear intent of the instrument, yet when such intent requires that words should be used in the larger sense, it is competent so to regard them. If we should hold that the Constitution regards the enactment as a whole, in an exclusive sense, we should be led to the conclusion that to become a law, all the substantial parts of the measure must have together passed through all the requisite stages before it became a law. State v. Platt, 2 S. C. (2 Rich.) 150, 156, 157, 16 Am. Rep. 647.

A "bill" is a form of a draft of a law presented to a Legislature but not enacted. After a bill has passed both branches of the Legislature and received the approval of the government, it becomes a law; but until then is a bill, a draft of a proposed law. And under a statute declaring that whosoever shall add to, alter, deface, erase, or mutilate any bill pending before either branch of the General Assembly shall be guilty of felony, the writing on the outside of a bill indorsements stating that it had passed, but in no manner changing or altering the bill itself, does not constitute an offense. State v. Hegeman (Del.) 44 Atl. 621, 622, 2 Pennewill, 147.

Within the contemplation of the Constitution requiring several reading of bills before their passage, a "bill" means a draft of the proposed law, and nothing else. After a bill has been introduced in one house, and an amendment which changes one or more of its original features or adds new features is adopted by such house, the amendment then enters into and becomes a part of the bill, as if it had been incorporated in the draft of the proposed law before it was introduced into such house. The Constitution provides that no law shall be passed except by bill, and further says, "nor shall any bill become a law unless the same shall have been read on three several days in each house previous to the final vote thereon." The term as here used is generic, and it means not only the draft of the proposed law as originally introduced, but such draft with all of the draftings which may be made thereon. Cohn v. Kingsley, 49 Pac. 985, 993, 5 Idaho, 416, 32 L. R. A. 74.

Same—As law or act.

"Bill," as used in Const. art. 4, § 18, declaring that no private or local bill which may be passed by the Legislature shall embrace more than one subject, and that shall be expressed in the title, is synonymous with the word "law" or "act." Durkee v. City of Janesville, 26 Wis. 697, 703. See, also, People v. Lawrence (N. Y.), 36 Barb. 177, 187.

The language of the constitutional provision that no legislative enactment shall contain more than one subject, which shall be clearly expressed in its title, differs in some respects in the different states. In some the word "act" is used, while in others the word "bill" or "law" is used. However, each of these provisions, as presented to the courts, means the final determination of the Legislature upon the particular subject embraced in such bill, act, or law. The word "act" is probably the best word to use, for it includes no action of the Legislature or of any person prior to the final act of the Legislature, and it includes the whole of the act; nothing more and nothing less. The word "law" is probably the worst word to use, for a portion of any act may be law, as well as the whole of the act. The word, however, as used in such connection is intended to be synonymous with "act." The word "bill" means the bill as it is first introduced, and as it may be at any time or in any of its stages until it is finally passed, signed by the necessary officers, and filed away as the highest evidence of what the law is. And when it is thus filed it is called the "enrolled bill." Where the constitutional provision uses the word "bill," it means that if any bill should in any stage be in conflict with the provision it should be amended by the Legislature, and if the Legislature should fail to correct it the bill itself, or some portion of it, would be void. Sedgwick County Com'rs v. Bailey, 13 Kan. 600, 608.

A "bill" is the draft or form of an act presented to the Legislature, but not enacted, and is not synonymous with "act," which is the appropriate term for the draft or form after it has been acted on by and passed the Legislature, when it becomes something more than a draft. Southwark Bank v. Commonwealth, 26 Pa. (2 Casey) 446, 450.

"Bill" is often used as synonymous with "act" or "law," but properly means the act as it is first introduced into one of the houses of the Legislature, and as it may be at any time in any of its stages until it is finally passed by both houses and signed by the officers of each house and by the Governor. Sedgwick County Com'rs v. Bailey, 13 Kan. 600, 608.

In pleading.

See "Ancillary Bill"; "Bill of Middlesex"; "Creditors' Bill"; "Cross-Bill"; "Fishing Bill"; "Original Bill"; "Supplemental Bill."

In the language of Story (Eq. Pl. § 268), a bill in chancery is not only a pleading for the purpose of bringing before the court and putting in issue the material allegations and charges on which the plaintiff's right to relief rests, but it is also in most cases an examination of a defendant on oath for the purpose of obtaining evidence to establish the plaintiff's case, or to counterprove or discharge the offense which may be set up by such defendant in his answer. Feeney v. Howard, 21 Pac. 984, 986, 79 Cal. 525, 4 L. R. A. 826, 12 Am. St. Rep. 162.

The term "bill," as used in equity pleadings, is the name of the pleading by which the complainant sets out his cause of action. United States v. Ambrose, 2 Sup. Ct. 682, 683, 108 U. S. 336.

The term "bill" is frequently used to designate the first pleading on the part of the plaintiff in causes which are equitable in their nature, although there is but one form of action in the state, which is designated as a "civil action," and though the word "complaint" may be correctly used to designate the first pleading of the plaintiff in all such cases. Sharon v. Sharon, 7 Pac. 456, 457, 67 Cal. 185.

The word "bill" or "complaint," when found in the Code of Civil Procedure, shall mean "petition." Cobbey's Ann. St. Neb. 1903, § 1851.

BILL AND NOTE BROKER.

A bill and note broker is a broker who buys and sells notes and bills of exchange. City of Little Rock v. Barton, 33 Ark. 436, 444.

A bill and note broker is one who negotiates the purchase and sale of bills of exchange and promissory notes, but no person can be considered a broker who buys notes and bills for himself. Gast v. Buckley (Ky.) 64 S. W. 632, 633.

The words "bill broker," as used in Act May 27, 1841, imposing a tax on bill brokers, is used in the sense of street brokers, as that phrase is used in the great commercial cities of the country, and are the agents and go-betweens of others, whereby the discount of bills in the street for an enormous usury is effected, and for which they receive a regular commission. Commonwealth v. Holmes, 11 Pa. (1 Jones) 468, 470.

BILL FOR ACCOUNT.

The phrases "bill for account" and "account rendered" were formally employed in a common-law practice to denote the procedure by which the account was secured, and the frequent inadequacy of the remedy at law or by jury trial gave rise to the equitable remedy of account. Field v. Brown, 45 N. E. 464, 465, 146 Ind. 293.

BILL FOR NEW TRIAL.

Where, after judgment has been rendered at law, facts are proven which show it to be against conscience to execute such judgment, and of which the injured party could not have availed himself in a court of law, or of which he might have availed himself at law, but was prevented by fraud or accident, unmixed with any fault or negligence in himself or his agents, a court of equity is authorized to interfere by injunction to restrain the adverse party from availing himself of such judgment, and bills setting up such facts and seeking such relief are called "bills for a new trial." Spo-kane Co-operative Min. Co. v. Pearson, 68 Pac. 165, 168, 28 Wash. 118.

BILL FOR RAISING REVENUE.

Ky. St. art. 2, § 30, declares that "all bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives." Held, that a "bill for raising revenue," as the term has been used and construed, means what are usually termed "money bills," and applies in general to bills for the levy of taxes in the strict sense of the term, and, as used in the federal Constitution, embraced all appropriations of money from the public treasury, whether the bill either provides for the levy of taxes, capitation or ad valorem, upon the people, or is a part of a system of laws or another bill which does so provide. "The principle underlying this provision of the Constitution is founded on the ground that the people are bound to pay the taxes to support the government, in consideration of protection to their lives, liberty, and property, and hence the payer of taxes was placed in the hands of the popular branch of the Legislature as a means of security to the people, from whom its members are selected, against exactions by taxation for other and strictly governmental purposes; and hence this view excludes from the comprehension of this constitutional clause such bills as appropriate money to or from the treasury raised from the people in consideration of other benefits and services than protection in their life, liberty, and property." And it is therefore clear that from every source that "bills for raising revenue" are confined to bills to levy taxes in the strict sense of the word, and do not embrace bills for other purposes which incidentally create revenue, unless so framed as to draw money from the people with no other advantage or benefit to them except the general protection which belongs to the citizens under our form of government as a matter of common rights. Commonwealth v. Bailey, 81 Ky. 395, 399. Any law which has for its object the taking of money from the people is a "bill for raising revenue." A bill regulating postal rates for postal services provides an equivalent for the money which the citizen may pay. He gets the service or lets it alone as he pleases, and hence the bill is not one to raise revenue. Commonwealth v. Bailey, 3 Ky. Law Rep. 110, 117.

BILL FOR SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE.

A "bill for specific performance" is a bill seeking to enforce the performance of a contract in the specified form in which it was agreed upon, and is addressed to the discretion or to the extraordinary jurisdiction of equity, and cannot be exercised in favor of those who have slept on their rights, or acquiesced in a title in possession adverse to their claim. Van Doren v. Robinson, 16 N. J. Eq. (1 C. E. Green) 256, 263.

BILL IN THE NATURE OF INTERPLEADER.

See, also, "Bill of Interpleader."

A "bill in the nature of an interpleader" lies by a party in interest to ascertain and establish his own rights when there are other conflicting rights between the third person, as where a mortgagor wishes to redeem a mortgaged estates, and there are conflicting claims between third persons as to their title to the mortgage money, he may bring them before the court to ascertain their rights, and to have a decree for redemption, and to make a secure payment to the party entitled to the money. By such bill the plaintiff seeks relief as well as protection. Pusey & Jones Co. v. Miller (U. S.) 61 Fed. 401, 403.

A "bill in the nature of an interpleader" is one in which the complainant asks some relief over and above a mere injunction against suit by the contesting parties, and states facts which entitle him to such relief independent of the fact of the adverse claims of the several defendants. Van Winkle v. Owen, 34 Atl. 400, 401, 54 N. J. Eq. 253.

BILL OBLIGATORY.

A "bill obligatory" is a bond without a condition, sometimes called a "single bill," and differing from a promissory note in nothing but the seal which is attached to it. Farmers' & Mechanics' Bank v. Greiner, 2 Serg. & R. 114, 115.

BILL NOT ORIGINAL.

A bill in equity which is a "bill not original" is one that relates to some matter orally litigated in the same court by the same person, and which is either an addition to or a continuance of an original bill, or both. Longworth v. Sturges, 4 Ohio St. 690, 708.

"Bills not original" are those which relate to some matter already litigated in the court by some person, and which are an addition to or continuance of an original bill, or both. According to this definition, a creditors' bill is a continuation of the former controversy, so far as the fruits of the judgment are concerned. Hatch v. Dorr, 11 Fed. Cas. 805, 806.

BILL OF ATTAINDER.

"A bill of attainder is a legislative act which inflicts punishment without a judicial trial. 'Bills of this sort,' says Mr. Justice Story, 'have been most usually passed in England in times of rebellion, or of gross subversivity to the Crown, or of violent political excitements, periods in which all nations are most liable, as well the free as enslaved, to forget their duties and to trample upon the rights and liberties of others.' These bills are generally directed against individuals by name, but they may be directed against a whole class." Cummings v. Missouri, 71 U. S. (4 Wall.) 277, 323, 18 L. Ed. 356.

A "bill of attainder," at the time of the adoption of the first Constitution of the state, had a well-understood meaning. It was a legislative judgment of conviction; an exercise of judicial power by Parliament, without a hearing, and in disregard of the first principles of natural justice. Such bills had been passed in England, and the parties thereby condemned had been put to death. People v. Hayes, 35 N. E. 951, 952, 140 N. Y. 484, 23 L. R. A. 830, 37 Am. St. Rep. 572.

"Bills of attainder" are such special acts of the Legislature as inflict capital punishment on all persons supposed to be guilty of high offenses, such as treason and felony, without any conviction in the ordinary course of judicial proceedings. Green v. Shumway, 39 N. Y. 418, 431; Gotchens v. Matheson (N. Y.) 40 How. Prac. 97, 102 (citing 3 Story, Comm. Const. 209); Anderson v. Baker, 23 Md. 531, 623 (citing Story's Const. § 1344); Ex parte Law, 35 Ga. 285, 298, 15 Fed. Cas. 8.

The term "bill of attainder," within the meaning of the federal Constitution, included a general statute passed after the Civil War, which required all attorneys at law to take an oath that they had never voluntarily borne arms against the United States, or given aid, countenance, counsel, or encouragement to persons engaged in armed hostilities thereto, as a condition to their right to practice in the Supreme Court of the United States. In this leading case the majority opinion was written by Field, J., and was based to a large extent upon a prior decision in the same term of Cummings v. State of Missouri, 4 Wall. 277, in which the statute of Missouri, requiring ministers of the Gospel to take a similar oath as a condition to their right to exercise the privileges of their profession, was held unconstitutional. Mr. Justice Miller, on behalf of himself, the Chief Justice, and Justices Swayne and Davis, delivered a dissenting opinion in Ex parte Garland, which is expressly made applicable not only to that case, but to the case of Cummings v. State of Missouri, in which he says "the word 'attainder' is derived by Sir Thomas Tomlins, in his law dictionary, from the words 'attincta' and 'attinctura,' and is defined to be 'the stain or corruption of the blood of a criminal capitally condemned; the immediate inseparable consequence of the common law on the pronouncing the sentence of death.' The effect of this corruption of the blood was that the party attainted lost all inheritable quality, and could neither receive nor transmit any property or other rights by inheritance. Upon an attentive examination of the distinctive features of this kind of legislation, I think it will be found that the following comprise those essential elements of bills of attainder, in addition to the one already mentioned, which distinguish them from other legislation, and which made them so obnoxious to the statesmen who organized our government: (1) They were convictions and sentences pronounced by the legislative department of the government, instead of the judicial. (2) The sentence pronounced and the punishment inflicted were determined by no previous law or fixed rule. (3) The investigation into the guilt of the accused, if any such were made, was not necessarily or generally conducted in his presence or that of his counsel, and no recognized rule of evidence governed the inquiry." The conclusion of the majority of the court was denied by the dissenting judges on the ground that the laws in question did not contain the essential requirements, in the definition of "bill of attainder," of working a corruption of blood, or in describing any person or class of persons by name or description. Ex parte Garland, 71 U. S. (4 Wall.) 333, 387, 18 L. Ed. 366.

Bill of pains and penalties included.

A bill of attainder is a legislative act which inflicts punishment without a judicial trial. If the punishment be less than death, it is a bill of pains and penalties. As the term "bill of attainder" is used in the federal Constitution, it includes both bills of attainder particularly, and bills of pains and penalties. Cummings v. Missouri, 71 U. S. (4 Wall.) 277, 18 L. Ed. 336; Drehman v. Stifle, 75 U. S. (8 Wall.) 505, 601, 19 L. Ed. 508; Pierce v. Carskadon, 83 U. S. (16 Wall.) 234, 239, 21 L. Ed. 276.

As used in U. S. Const. art. 1, § 10, providing that no state shall pass any "bill of attainder," ex post facto law, or laws impairing the obligation of contracts or granting any title of nobility, means a legislative act which inflicts punishments without a judicial trial. "If the punishment be less than death, the act is termed a 'bill of pains and penalties.'" Within the meaning of the Constitution, bills of attainder include bills of pains and penalties." Hence Act March 29, 1867, providing for a convention to revise and amend a state constitution requiring of an elector, when challenged, that he solemnly swear that he had never voluntarily borne arms against the United States since he had been a resident thereof; had voluntarily given no aid, countenance, counsel, or encouragement to persons engaged in armed hostility thereto; that he had neither sought nor expected nor attempted to exercise the functions of any office whatever, under any authority or pretended authority in hostility to the United States; and that he had not yielded a voluntary support to any pretended government, authority, power, or constitution within the United States, hostile or inimical thereto; and did not unlawfully desert from the military or naval service of the United States, or leave the state to avoid a draft during the late Rebellion—is a bill of pains and penalties, and void within the constitutional provision against the passage of a bill of attainder. Green v. Shumway (N. Y.) 36 How. Prac. 5, 7.

"Bill of attainder," as used in a constitution where the passage of any bill of attainder is prohibited, is a generic term, meaning both bills of attainder, properly so called at common law, and bills of pains and penalties. Gaines v. Buford, 31 Ky. (1 Dana) 481, 509.

"A bill of attainder is a special act of legislature which inflicts punishment without a judicial trial. If the punishment is less than death, the act is called a 'bill of pains and penalties.'" As used in Const. U. S. art. 1, § 9, prohibiting bills of attainder, it includes bills of pains and penalties. In re Yung Sing Hee (U. S.) 36 Fed. 437, 439.

BILL OF COSTS.

The phrase "bill of costs," as used in a statute authorizing the taxation of a bill of costs, means the costs legally taxable in a particular suit to the person entitled thereto. Doe v. Thompson, 22 N. H. 217, 219.

BILL OF CREDIT.

A "bill of credit," in its commercial sense, comprehends a great variety of evidences of debt, which circulate as money in a commercial community. In the early history of banks, their notes were generally denominated "bills of credit," but in modern times they have lost that designation, and are now called either "bank bills" or "bank notes." The definition of a "bill of credit," however, as the term is used in statutes, ordinarily applies only to paper emitted or issued by colonies or states, by the sovereign power, containing a pledge of its faith for its ultimate redemption. Briscoe v. Bank of Kentucky, 36 U. S. (11 Pet.) 257, 271, 9 L. Ed. 709.

The term "bill of credit" as used in the federal Constitution, is a paper intended to circulate through the community, for its ordinary purposes as money, which paper is redeemable at a future day. Craig v. Missouri, 29 U. S. (4 Pet.) 410, 431, 7 L. Ed. 903; Breitenbach v. Turner, 18 Wis. 140, 146; Linn v. State Bank of Illinois, 2 Ill. (1 Scam.) 87, 91, 25 Am. Dec. 71. See, also, Indiana v. Woram, 6 Hill, 33, 37, 40 Am. Dec. 378. It signifies "a paper medium intended to circulate between individuals, and between government and individuals for the purposes of society." Breitenbach v. Turner, 18 Wis. 140, 145; Pagaud v. State, 13 Miss. (5 Smedes & M.) 491. It means "promissory notes or bills, for the payment of which the faith of the state only is pledged. They are such bills as were emitted by Congress in the different states anterior to the adoption of the Constitution." State v. Bills, 2 McCord, 12, 15. Also "paper issued by a state on the faith of the state, which circulates on the credit of the state, and is received and used in the ordinary business of life." Hale v. Huston, 44 Ala. 134, 138, 4 Am. Rep. 124; Poindexter v. Greenhow, 5 Sup. Ct. 903, 910, 114 U. S. 270, 29 L. Ed. 185; Bailey v. Milner, 35 Ga. 330, 332 (U. S.) 2 Fed. Cas. 378; Delafield v. Illinois, 26 Wend. 192, 218.

As to the term "bills of credit," the Chief Justice said: "Bills of credit signify a paper medium intended to circulate between individuals, and between the government and individuals, for the ordinary purposes of society." In the case of Briscoe v. Bank of Commonwealth of Kentucky, 36 U. S. (11 Pet.) 257, 313, 9 L. Ed. 709, the court, speaking of this definition, says: "A definition so general would certainly embrace every description of paper which circulates as money." Lucas v. City of San Francisco, 7 Cal. 463, 477.

"The term 'bill of credit,' says Marshall, C. J., delivering the opinion of the court in the case of Craig v. State, "in its enlarged and literal sense, may comprehend any instrument by which a state engages to pay money at a future date." As the term is used in the federal Constitution, prohibiting the states from emitting bills of credit, it includes notes of the Bank of the Commonwealth of Kentucky. Bank of Commonwealth of Kentucky v. Clark, 4 Mo. 59, 60, 28 Am. Dec. 345.

"To 'emit bills of credit' conveys to the mind the idea of issuing paper intended to circulate through the community for its ordinary purposes as money, which paper is redeemable at a future day. This is a sense in which the term has always been understood." Bank of Commonwealth of Kentucky v. Clark, 4 Mo. 59, 61, 28 Am. Dec. 345; Shollenberger v. Brinton, 52 Pa. (2 P. F. Smith) 9, 31, 54; Linn v. State Bank of Illinois, 2 Ill. (1 Scam.) 87, 91, 25 Am. Dec. 71.

Bill of chartered state bank

Notes issued by a bank created by the state which upon their face purported to be issued by the president and directors of the bank, and which contained no pledge of the faith of the state in any form, but were issued on the credit of the funds of the bank, the president and directors not assuming to act as agents of the state, were not "bills of credit issued by the state," within the inhibition of the Constitution, though the capital of the bank was to be paid by the state. Briscoe v. Bank of Commonwealth of Kentucky, 36 U. S. (11 Pet.) 257, 312, 9 L. Ed. 709.

The constitutional inhibition against emitting bills of credit does not include notes issued by a state bank which are payable in coin, but only means "paper money," properly so called, issued by the mere authority of the government, and resting for support on the credit of the government. Owen v. Branch Bank at Mobile, 3 Ala. 258; Jones v. Bank of Tennessee, 47 Ky. (8 B. Mon.) 122, 46 Am. Dec. 540.

The entire stock of the Bank of the State of Arkansas was owned by the state, which furnished the capital and received the profits. The president and trustees were to have a common seal, were authorized to deal in bullion, gold and silver, etc., purchase real property, erect buildings, issue notes, and make loans, etc. Some doubt was suggested whether the notes of this bank were not "bills of credit" within the prohibition of the Constitution. But to constitute a "bill of credit" within the Constitution, it must be issued by a state on the faith of the state, and be designed to circulate as money; it must be a paper which circulates on the credit of the state, and is so received and used in the ordinary business of life. The bills of this bank were not made payable by the state, and capital was provided for their redemption, and the general management of the bank and the charter were committed to the president and treasurer, as in ordinary banking associations. The holders could in a summary manner obtain judgments against their debtors, and, although the directors were not expressly made liable to be sued, yet without doubt they could be held legally responsible for an abuse of the trust confided to them. Woodruff v. Trapnall, 51 U. S. (10 How.) 190, 205, 13 L. Ed. 383.

Bills of a banking corporation are not bills of credit, though the state creating the bank is the only stockholder, and pledges its faith for the redemption of the bills. A bill of credit emanates from the sovereignty of the state. It rests for its currency on the faith of the state, pledged by a public law. Darrington v. Branch of Bank of Alabama, 54 U. S. (13 How.) 12, 14 L. Ed. 30.

Certificate of indebtedness.

Certificates of indebtedness issued by the Governor of a state, under a statute authorizing such issue for the purpose of paying the current expenses of the state, and made receivable for all state taxes, etc., and which is actually issued, containing a recital that the sum specified is due by the state and that the certificate is receivable in payment of all state dues, are bills of credit. City Nat. Bank v. Mahan, 21 La. Ann. 751, 753.

A "bill of credit," in its enlarged, and perhaps in its literal, sense, may be defined as any instrument by which a state engages to pay money at a future day, and includes a certificate given for borrowed money. "Bills of credit" signify a paper medium intended to circulate between individuals, and between the government and individuals, for the ordinary purposes of society. Craig v. State, 29 U. S. (4 Pet.) 410, 431, 7 L. Ed. 903.

Confederate treasury note.

The term "bills of credit" cannot be construed to include the securities known as "Confederate treasury notes," issued by the self-styled "Confederate States" during the Civil War of 1861. "Bill of credit" means a paper issued by the sovereign power, containing a pledge of its faith, and designed to circulate as money. A paper currency emitted by a state, and receivable in discharge of all debts and taxes due the state, and of all salaries and fees of offices, and pledging the faith and funds of the state for the redemption of this paper issued, are bills of credit. Bailey v. Milner (U. S.) 2 Fed. Cas. 378, 379.

Loan office certificate.

A "bill of credit," as used in its constitutional sense, includes loan office certificates issued by the state, which were made receivable by all the officers of the state, both civil and military, in the discharge and payment of both salaries and fees. Loper v. State, 1 Mo. 632, 633.

Revenue bond scrip.

A paper which is a "bill of credit" has three essentials: (1) It must be issued by state in its sovereign character; (2) it must contain a pledge of the faith of the state; (3) it must be a design to circulate as money. Thus revenue bond scrip of the state of South Carolina issues in denominations as small as $1, which bears no interest and no date of payment, but the faith and funds of the state are pledged to their ultimate redemption, and they were made receivable at all times after their issuance for all dues and taxes to the state, except taxes levied to pay interest on the public debt, and when so received the State Treasurer was authorized to pay the amount again, with satisfaction of any kind against the treasury. They were intended to circulate as money, and hence constituted "bills of credit" within the prohibition of the Constitution of the United States. Wesley v. Eells (U. S.) 90 Fed. 151, 158.

State bank bill.

Bills issued by the State Bank of Illinois under an act of the State Legislature permitting it to do so, which bills purported on their face to be receivable at the treasury or any loan office of the state of Missouri in discharge of debts due the state, are bills of credit. Lynn v. State of Illinois, 2 Ill. 87, 91, 25 Am. Dec. 78.

State bond.

Mere state bonds made payable to the bearer fall, within the constitutional inhibition, upon the state to issue bills of credit. But bonds which are simply transferable certificates of stock, and binding the state to pay money at a future day for services actually rendered or for money borrowed, are not included within the term. Delafield v. Illinois, 26 Wend. 192, 218.

State warrant.

A contract by which a state binds itself to pay money at a future day for service actually received or for money borrowed for present use is not a bill of credit. Linn v. State Bank of Illinois, 2 Ill. (1 Scam.) 87, 90, 25 Am. Dec. 71.

"Bills of credit," as used in Const. U. S. art. 1, § 10, forbidding any state to emit bills of credit, should be construed to include treasury warrants issued by the state which are receivable at par in payment of the debts of the state, being issued on the faith and credit of the state, the promise to pay being directly that of the state, and being designed as a substitute for money. Bragg v. Tuffts, 6 S. W. 158, 162, 49 Ark. 554.

A warrant drawn by state authorities in payment of an appropriation made by the Legislature for a debt due from the state to an individual, and payable upon presentation if there be funds in the treasury, cannot be deemed a "bill of credit," within the meaning of Const. U. S. art. 1, § 10, prohibiting a state from emitting bills of credit, although the state directs its officers to receive such warrants as money in payment of certain dues to the state, and to deliver them to those who would receive them as money in payment of dues from the state, but not to reissue them when once they come back to the treasury of the state. Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Texas, 20 Sup. Ct. 545, 554, 177 U. S. 66, 44 L. Ed. 672.

BILL OF DISCOVERY.

A "bill of discovery," in the old chancery courts, was an auxiliary or assistant proceeding to the courts of law, and arose from the defects in the courts of common law to compel a complete discovery by the oath of the parties in the suit. Modern legislation, however, has greatly interfered with the practical exercise of the auxiliary jurisdiction for discovery by introducing simpler and more efficacious methods in its stead, and thus rendering resort to it unnecessary, and even inexpedient. In some of the states a "suit for discovery," properly so called, is expressly abolished by statute, and in all of them is utterly inconsistent with both the fundamental theory and with the particular doctrines and methods of the reformed procedure. Wright v. Superior Court of Santa Clara County, 73 Pac. 145, 146, 139 Cal. 469.

"A 'bill of discovery,'" says Lord Redesdale, in Mitf. 52, "is commonly used in aid of the jurisdiction of some other court, so as to enable the plaintiff to prosecute or defend an action at law," and the bill must be filed as soon as the party discovers the necessity of appealing to the conscience of his adversary. Equity will not suffer him to spin out litigation, take the chance of a jury, and, failing there, file his bill for discovery. Faulkner's Adm'r v. Harwood, 6 Rand. 125, 129. It is commonly used in aid of the jurisdiction of some court at law, to enable the party to obtain discovery of the facts which are material to the prosecution or defense thereof. If it can be used in any other cases, they are few, and under very special circumstances. Everson v. Equitable Life Assur. Co. (U. S.) 68 Fed. 253, 259 (citing Story's Eq. Pl. § 331).

A bill of discovery is "a bill showing a cause of action, and praying for the discovery of particular facts alleged to be true in fact, but which are peculiarly within the knowledge of the defendant." Carroll v. Carroll, 11 Barb. 293, 298. It is a mere instrument of procedure in aid of relief sought by the party in some other judicial controversy, filed for the sole purpose of proving the plaintiff's case from the defendant's own mouth, or from documents in his possession, and asking no relief in the suit, except it may be a temporary stay of the proceedings in another suit to which the discovery relates. State v. Security Savings & Trust Co., 43 Pac. 162, 164, 28 Or. 410.

Every bill is in reality a "bill of discovery," but the species of bill usually distinguished by that title is a bill for discovery of facts resting in the knowledge of the defendant, or of deeds or writings or other things in his custody or power, and seeking no relief in consequence of the discovery. McFarland v. Hunter (Va.) 8 Leigh, 489, 492 (citing Mitford, p. 52).

BILL OF EXCEPTIONS.

A bill of exceptions is a formal statement in writing of the exceptions taken to the opinion, decision, or direction of the judge, delivered during the trial of a cause, setting forth the proceedings on the trial, the opinion or decision given, and the exception taken thereto, and sealed by the judge in testimony of its correctness. Everman v. Hyman, 23 N. E. 1022, 1023, 28 Ind. App. 165, 84 Am. St. Rep. 284; Herron v. State, 46 N. E. 540, 542, 17 Ind. App. 161 (citing Schlunger v. State, 113 Ind. 295, 15 N. E. 269; Bowen v. State, 108 Ind. 411, 9 N. E. 378); Galvin v. State, 56 Ind. 51, 56; Bowen v. State, 108 Ind. 411, 414, 9 N. E. 378, 379 (citing 2 Works, Pr. § 1075); St. Croix Lumber Co. v. Pennington, 11 N. W. 497, 498, 2 Dak. 467; Huddleston v. State, 66 Tenn. (7 Baxt.) 55, 56.

A bill of exceptions is a statement of the points on which the court below gave an opinion. Coxe v. Field, 13 N. J. Law (1 J. S. Green) 215, 218; Oliver v. Phelps, 20 N. J. Law (Spencer) 180, 183 (quoting 3 Bl.

Comm. 372); Garretson v. Appleton, 37 Atl. 150, 152, 58 N. J. Law (29 Vroom) 386.

A bill of exceptions is a single history of the case as tried, and should contain nothing more or less than the facts as they appeared to the court and jury from the commencement of the trial until the final judgment of the court. It is a formal statement in writing of exceptions taken to a ruling, decision, charge, or opinion of the trial judge setting up the proceedings on the trial. It should contain all evidence necessary to an understanding of the exceptions. Motions made during the trial of a cause, and the rulings of the court thereon, must be preserved in a bill of exceptions. Rogers v. Richards, 47 Pac. 719, 720, 8 N. M. 658.

A "bill of exceptions" is defined as a formal statement in writing taken by a party to the decision of the court on a point of law, clearly stating the objection, with the facts and circumstances on which it is founded, which, to attest its accuracy, is authenticated by the trial judge according to law. Freeburgh v. Lamoureux (Wyo.) 73 Pac. 545, 547.

A bill of exceptions is a written statement, settled and signed by the judge, of what the ruling was, the facts in view of which it was made, and the protest of counsel. A document which merely details certain acts which transpired at the trial of a cause, and fails to show that there was any ruling by the court in relation thereto, or any protest against the action of the court, is not a bill of exceptions. People v. Torres, 38 Cal. 141, 142.

A bill of exceptions is a statement of the objections made by the parties to the ruling of the court. A bill of exceptions showing that the ruling of the court was objected to at the time it was made on the trial is sufficient, it not being necessary to state specifically that the ruling of the court was excepted to. Sackett v. McCord, 23 Ala. 851, 854.

A bill of exceptions is a method of placing the law of the case on a record which is to be brought before the appellate court by writ of error. Ex parte Crane, 30 U. S. (5 Pet.) 190, 193, 8 L. Ed. 92.

A bill of exceptions is a statement of the questions made, and exceptions taken to the ruling of the court or judge on the trial of a cause to a jury. Berly v. Taylor, 5 Hill, 577, 579.

A bill of exceptions is a formal statement, for the purpose of a writ of error or appeal, to a court possessing the proper jurisdiction, by way of review, of exceptions taken on the trial. Caston v. Brock, 14 S. C. 104, 108.

The office of a bill of exceptions is to bring into the record of a case those material matters which otherwise would not appear. Mewis v. Johnson Harvester Co., 5 Neb. 217, 218.

"A bill of exceptions is the means for placing matters on the record of proceedings in a case, where they do not properly belong to it, and the bill of exceptions should contain matter so intended to be placed on the record. It means a present and distinct substantive case, and is conclusive on the court." Berry v. Hale, 2 Miss. (1 How.) 315, 318.

In Rogers v. Richards, 47 Pac. 719, 8 N. M. 658, defining a "bill of exceptions," it is said that it should embrace, among other things, all the evidence necessary to an understanding of the exceptions, to which should have been added, "and a review thereof." Denver & R. G. R. Co. v. United States, 51 Pac. 679, 680, 9 N. M. 309.

"The sole office of a bill of exceptions is to make matters which are extrinsic or out of the record a part of the record." Kitchell v. Burgwin, 21 Ill. (11 Peck) 40, 45; State v. Anders (Kan.) 68 Pac. 668.

A "bill of exceptions," as the expression shows, must contain exceptions; but exceptions lie only for some error of law occurring at the trial, and, a motion for a new trial being made after verdict and before judgment, no exception lies to any ruling of such motion. Kearney v. Snodgrass, 7 Pac. 309, 310, 12 Or. 311.

The stenographer's report of the evidence brought into the transcript by the clerk is not a bill of exceptions. State v. Bercaw, 31 N. E. 798, 132 Ind. 260.

Extract from minutes of clerk.

An extract from the minutes of the clerk, signed by the judge in the due course of the proceedings of the court had from day to day during the term, is not a bill of exceptions. Haraszthy v. Horton, 46 Cal. 545.

As part of the record.

At common law a bill of exceptions formed no part of the record in the trial court, and the original was carried into the appellate court and there annexed to the record. It was for the benefit of the party tendering it, and he could use it or not as he saw proper. Rev. St. Fla. § 1268, provides that when the bill is signed by the trial judge it shall become a part of the record in the case, and the original is not sent up, but the clerk certifies it as a part of the record of the proceedings below. It is said in Bailey v. Clark, 6 Fla. 516, that a bill of exceptions is made up with care by the judge, under the solemn sanction of his signature and seal, with the aid of the attorneys of the respective parties during the term of court at which the trial is had, unless by special order further time is allowed, and has absolute verity. Glaser v.

Hackett, 20 South. 820, 821, 38 Fla. 84. See, also, People v. Trim, 37 Cal. 274, 275.

A "bill of exceptions," as the term was used at common law, meant a statement of facts by the party whose pleadings were overruled or exceptions disallowed, and on which the court was required to put its seal if the statement was correct. "This statement so sealed was ultimately to form a part of the record, and as such was liable to revision by the court of errors. Great formality and certainty was necessary. It must set forth just so much and no more of the elements and proceedings necessary to show the precise nature of the exceptions. It must be engrossed (formerly on parchment), and then tendered to the judge. Then the seal must be acknowledged or proved, and the bill must be tacked to the record. In this country the bill of exceptions is regulated by statutes and rules, equal in particularity with the English statute in all matters of substance, and require as much, if not more, time and care in its preparation by notice, amendment, settling, and signing, and its office is the same, it being made a part of the record which may go to the court of error. When the record is thus completed, the errors of law apparent thereon, whether arising from the original record or the bill of exceptions, may be reviewed on the writ." State v. Clifford, 16 N. W. 25, 27, 58 Wis. 113.

As a pleading.

A bill of exceptions is not to be considered as a writing of the judge, but as a pleading of the party alleging the exception. Like any other pleading, it is to be construed most strongly against the party preparing it, and he must be responsible for all uncertainty and omissions. Johnson v. Johnson, 58 N. E. 237, 240, 187 Ill. 86.

BILL OF EXCHANGE.

See "Accommodation Bill or Note"; "Approved Bill or Paper"; "Bank Bill"; "Current Bills"; "Foreign Bills of Exchange"; "Inland Bill of Exchange"; "Safe Bills"; "Single Bill."

A bill of exchange is a written order or request by one person to another for the payment of a specified sum of money to a third person absolutely and at all events. Luff v. Pope (N. Y.) 5 Hill, 413, 416; Adams v. Boyd, 33 Ark. 33, 47; Gaar v. Louisville Banking Co., 74 Ky. (11 Bush) 180, 186, 21 Am. Rep. 209; Coffin v. Spencer (U. S.) 39 Fed. 262, 263; Smith v. Wood, 1 N. J. Eq. (Saxt.) 74, 90; Carran v. Little, 40 Ohio St. 397, 399; Hoyt v. Lynch, 4 N. Y. Super. Ct. (2 Sandf.) 328, 332; Jones v. Pacific Wood Lumber & Flume Co., 13 Nev. 359, 372, 39 Am. Rep. 308.

A bill of exchange is an instrument, negotiable in form, by which one, who is called the "drawer," requests another, called the "drawee," to pay a specified sum of money. Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 3171; Civ. Code Idaho 1901, § 2911; Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 4110; Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 3653; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 4914; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 2229; Rev. St. Utah 1898, § 1612; Rev. St. Wyo. 1899, § 2393; Woolley v. Sergeant, 8 N. J. Law (3 Halst.) 262, 264, 14 Am. Dec. 419.

A bill of exchange is an unconditional order in writing, addressed by one person to another, signed by the person giving it, requiring the person to whom it is addressed to pay on demand, or at a fixed or determinable future time, a sum certain in money, to order or to bearer. Negotiable Instruments Law N. D. § 126; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 1054; Bates' Ann. St. Ohio 1904, § 3175q; Ann. Codes & St. Or. 1901, § 4528; Code Supp. Va. 1898, § 2841a.

A bill of exchange is an order by one person, called the "drawer" or "maker," to another, called the "drawee" or "acceptor," to pay money to another (who may be the drawer himself), called the "payee," or his order, or to the bearer. Civ. Code Ga. 1895, § 3676.

A bill of exchange is an order upon the drawee to pay a certain sum of money to the holder. Such a bill, when the drawee has the funds of the drawer in his hands, is a transfer by the drawer of this fund to the payee, and creates in the latter, if not a legal, at least an equitable, interest in the fund. Janney v. Bank of Missouri, 12 Mo. 583, 587.

"A bill of exchange is an open letter by one person to a second, directing him, in effect, to pay absolutely, and at all events, a certain sum of money therein named to a third person, or to any other to whom that third person may order it to be paid; or it may be payable to a bearer, and to the drawer himself." Nicely v. Commercial Bank, 44 N. E. 572, 574, 15 Ind. App. 563, 57 Am. St. Rep. 245 (quoting Culbertson v. Nelson, 93 Iowa, 187, 61 N. W. 854, 27 L. R. A. 222, 57 Am. St. Rep. 266); Allen v. Leavens, 37 Pac. 488, 489, 26 Or. 164, 26 L. R. A. 620, 46 Am. St. Rep. 613.

A bill of exchange is an instrument governed by the commercial law; it must carry on its face its authority to command the money drawn for, so that the holder, or the notary acting as his agent, may receive the money, and give a discharge, on presenting the bill and receiving payment; or, if payment is refused, enter a protest, from which follows the incident of damages. But if no demand can be made on the bill standing alone, and it depends on other papers or documents to give it force and effect, and these must necessarily accompany the bill and be presented with it, it cannot be a simple bill of exchange, that circulates from hand to hand as the representative of cash. It derives all of its properties from the commercial law. It is a most convenient instrument for the transfer of funds, and its chief and only value in such respect arises from the legal principles in which it is invested, and which regulate the duties and liabilities of those who become parties to it. United States v. Bank of United States, 46 U. S. (5 How.) 382, 408, 12 L. Ed. 199. It is neither an export nor an import. It is not transmitted through the ordinary channels of commerce, but through the mail. It is a note, merely ordering the payment of money, which may be negotiated by indorsement, and the liability of the names that are on it depends upon certain acts to be done by the holder when it becomes payable. The taxing power of a state extends to such bills. Nathan v. Louisiana, 49 U. S. (8 How.) 73, 81, 12 L. Ed. 993.

Bills of exchange and promissory notes are commercial instruments to facilitate commerce, and are subject to certain rules of law not applicable to other contracts. Smith v. Kendall, 9 Mich. 241, 242, 80 Am. Dec. 83.

It is not essential to the validity of a bill of exchange that it be in form negotiable. Coursin v. Ledlie's Adm'rs, 31 Pa. (7 Casey) 506, 509.

The term "bill of exchange," as used in the act relating to bills of exchange and promissory notes, shall be so construed as to include all drafts or orders drawn by one person on another for the payment of a sum of money specified therein. Ann. St. Ind. T. 1896, § 453.

A "bill of exchange," within Gen. St. 1901, § 547, providing that no person shall be charged as an acceptor of a bill of exchange unless his acceptance shall be in writing, means nothing more than a written order to pay money. Shutt Imp. Co. v. Erwin, 71 Pac. 521, 522, 66 Kan. 261.

While a bill of exchange contains no express promise between the parties, the promise is implied on the value received from the general usage which is the foundation of the common law. Brooks v. Page (Vt.) 1 D. Chip. 340, 344.

An order drawn by a creditor on his debtor for the payment of money certain is none the less a bill of exchange because it shows on what account it is to be applied or the consideration which has been received. It does not indicate an intention to transfer or bind the amount of a debt, more or less, but fixes the amount which is ordered to be paid. It is not material whether it is defined as a particular sum "due us," or a sum "which is due us." Hillstrom v. Anderson, 49 N. W. 187, 46 Minn. 382.

An order drawn at the foot of a bill rendered for services done, expressing a certain sum as due by the debtor in such bill, and drawn on a third person requesting him to pay the bill and charge it to such debtor, is a bill of exchange. Hoyt v. Lynch, 4 N. Y. Super. Ct. (2 Sandf.) 328, 332.

An order in the form, "Pay J. or order $300, if the same may be due him from me on his and my settlement out of the last payment due from you to me on the house which I am now building for you," accepted by the drawee, is not a bill of exchange, but, in order that the payee may recover, he must prove that there was due him upon settlement with the drawers $300, or some other amount, and that a sum of money was due from the acceptor out of the last payment to be made by him. Jackman v. Bowker, 45 Mass. (4 Metc.) 235, 241.

An order for a definite sum not drawn on any particular fund is not an assignment, but is a bill of exchange, within Code, § 1766, providing that no person must be charged as acceptor of a bill of exchange unless his acceptance is in writing, signed by himself or agent. Anderson v. Jones, 14 South. 871, 872, 102 Ala. 537.

As bank check.

"Bank checks are not bills of exchange, and, though the rules applicable to each are in many respects the same, they differ in important particulars. Among these particulars is that a check is drawn against funds on deposit with the banker, and the indorsement that it is good implies that when the indorsement is made there were funds there to meet it. A bill of exchange is not drawn on such deposits necessarily, and its acceptance raises no implication that the drawer has such funds to meet it. It is a new promise by the acceptor to pay, funds or no funds. In both cases the bank is supposed to know the signature of its correspondent, and cannot, after indorsing it as good or accepted, dispute his signature. One of the main elements of utility in a bill of exchange is that it was circulated freely, and it may thus pass through many hands on the faith of the acceptor's signature. It may possibly be that he should be responsible for the promise contained in it as it came from his hands, for it was drawn on no special fund, and the possession of such fund by him does not affect his liability. By such acceptance he becomes primarily liable as if he were the maker of a promissory note." Espy v. First Nat. Bank of Cincinnati, 85 U. S. (18 Wall.) 604, 605, 21 L. Ed. 947.

A check is a draft or order upon a bank or banker, as purporting to be drawn upon a deposit of funds for the payment at all events of a certain sum of money to a certain person named therein, or to him or to his order, or to bearer, and payable instantly on demand. Daniel's Negotiable Instruments, § 1566. Bank checks are not inland bills of exchange, but have many of the properties of such commercial paper, the chief points of difference being that a check is always drawn on a bank or banker; no days of grace are allowed; the drawee is not discharged by the laches of the holder in presentment for payment, unless he can show that he sustained some injury by the default; it is not due until the payment is demanded, and the statute of limitation runs only from that time. It is by its face the appropriation of so much money of the drawer in the hands of the drawee to the payment of an admitted liability of the drawer. Merchants' Bank v. State Bank, 77 U. S. (10 Wall.) 604, 647, 19 L. Ed. 1008. But as the execution and delivery of such paper assigns to the payee a specified amount represented as belonging to the drawer in the hands of the drawee, it is really an undertaking that the bank or banker on whom it is drawn will deliver to the payee the amount of money expressed, and comes within the provision of the statute of limitations relating to simple contracts in writing. Haynes v. Wesley, 37 S. E. 990, 991, 112 Ga. 668.

The ancient bill of exchange was a mere convenience for enabling a creditor of the drawer to receive his payment at some other place than the latter's residence, and it was drawn on correspondents who knew of the credit and responsibility of the drawer, and were willing to pay money at his request, and look to him for reimbursement, either by remittance, or by reciprocal honor to their own bills of exchange. In modern times, at least, the check upon a banker has attained a different significance. The banker is not customarily or often in the habit of honoring checks except as they are drawn against a fund first placed in his hands for that purpose. Raesser v. National Exch. Bank, 88 N. W. 618, 619, 112 Wis. 591.

Although a check upon a bank is in many respects a bill of exchange, yet as the Penal Code distinguishes between them in that, while rendering the forgery of either an offense, it does not provide for the case of drawing a check in a fictitious name, while it does for the execution of a bill of exchange, a conviction under the kind describing a check as a "bill of exchange" cannot be sustained. Townsend v. State, 19 S. E. 55, 56, 92 Ga. 732.

A check is a species of inland bill of exchange, not with all the incidents of an ordinary bill of exchange it is true, but still it belongs to that class of commercial paper. Exchange Bank v. Sutton Bank, 28 Atl. 563, 564, 78 Md. 577, 23 L. R. A. 173.

A "bill of exchange," as used in Gen. St. 1901, c. 14, § 9, providing that an acceptance thereof written on any other paper than the bill shall not bind the acceptor except in favor of a person to whom such paper has been shown, includes a bank check. Eakin v. Citizens' State Bank (Kan.) 72 Pac. 874, 875.

A "bill of exchange," as used in Act 1872, c. 270, providing that a married woman may be sued jointly with her husband on a "note, bill of exchange," etc., includes a check, since a check is, at least in a qualified sense, an inland bill of exchange. Wilderman v. Rogers, 6 Atl. 588, 589, 66 Md. 127.

A check is a short bill of exchange, payable on demand, and is therefore within the term "bill of exchange" in Act Ill. Nov. 5, 1849, § 2, providing that all actions founded on bills of exchange, orders, etc., shall be commenced within five years after the action accrued. Rogers v. Durant, 11 Sup. Ct. 754, 755, 140 U. S. 298, 35 L. Ed. 481.

An order by A. upon B. to pay money to C., without words of negotiability, is not an "inland bill of exchange," but is classed with bank checks, and the drawer is entitled, as the drawer of a bank check, to notice of the failure of the drawee to pay upon presentation. Sinclair v. Johnson, 85 Ind. 527, 528.

Consideration imported.

It is not necessary that a bill of exchange, either foreign or inland, should recite that it is for value received. Being an order for the payment of money to another, it imports under the law merchant a consideration without such recital. Taylor v. Newman, 77 Mo. 257, 262.

Draft synonymous.

See "Draft."

As equitable assignment.

See "Equitable Assignment."

As equitable assignment pro tanto.

A bill of exchange or check is not an equitable assignment pro tanto of the funds of the drawer in the hands of the drawee. American Pin Co. v. Wright, 46 Atl. 215, 217, 60 N. J. Eq. 147.

As order for payment of goods.

The term "bill of exchange" does not include an order payable in merchandise. "It is too well settled to need the citation of authority that it is essential to a bill of exchange that it should be drawn for money, and all other drafts or orders drawn for other commodities operate only as an authority to receive the contents, and the holder of them is not bound to apply either the speed or the formalities required in conducting a bill of exchange, and, when they sue, must resort to the original cause of action." Coyle's Ex'r v. Saterwhite's Adm'r, 20 Ky. (4 T. B. Mon.) 124, 125. See, also, Johnson v. Warden, 1 Tenn. Cas. 670, 671.

The term "bill of exchange" does not include an order for the payment of a certain sum in chattels, and the law and incidents of a bill of exchange do not attach to such an instrument. Therefore such an order does not legally import an undertaking by the drawer that the payee shall obtain the chattels, nor that the drawer will be answerable to him for the value of them on the drawee's refusal to accept or to pay the order. Sears v. Lawrence, 81 Mass. (15 Gray) 267, 269; Hyland v. Blodgett, 9 Or. 168, 42 Am. Rep. 799.

A bill of exchange is an order or letter requesting the payment of money. It does not include a request to pay in any other substance or commodity. Thus a cotton obligation, or a promise to pay cotton, is neither a promissory note nor a bill of exchange. Auerbach v. Pritchett, 58 Ala. 451, 457.

As payable out of general fund.

A bill of exchange is an order for a sum certain payable in money absolutely, and not contingently or out of any particular fund, but generally. Hillstrom v. Anderson, 49 N. W. 187, 46 Minn. 382.

An order payable out of a particular fund is not properly a bill of exchange, though it is accepted generally, since the acceptance necessarily follows the nature of the draft. Smith v. Wood, 1 N. J. Eq. (Saxt.) 74, 90.

A "bill of exchange" in its proper legal sense is a bill for the payment at all events in money of a sum certain, and must not be in the alternative or payable out of a particular fund, and in order to give the holder a right of action on it against the payee must be accepted by the drawee. Burch v. Newbury, 10 N. Y. (6 Seld.) 374, 385.

"An order to pay money out of a particular fund is not a bill of exchange; but an order to pay, with directions to the drawee as to how he may reimburse himself, is a bill of exchange." Carran v. Little, 40 Ohio St. 397, 399.

A "bill of exchange" implies a personal general credit, not limited or applicable to particular circumstances and events which cannot be known to the holder in the general course of negotiation. Coffin v. Spencer (U. S.) 39 Fed. 262, 263.

Written instrument imported.

The phrase "bill of exchange" necessarily imports that there is a written instrument. Pierson v. Townsend (N. Y.) 2 Hill, 550, 551; Citizens' Bank of Dyersburg v. Millett, 44 S. W. 366, 372, 103 Ky. 1, 82 Am. St. Rep. 546.

BILL OF INDICTMENT.

The recital in the caption of an indictment can always be made to conform with the truth. The names of the grand jury can-be inserted, and the day of the term in which they are in session and upon which they find their bill. This can be done at any time without altering or in any wise interfering with the material and essential allegations in an indictment. Before the paper containing the criminal charge is handed out to the grand jury, it is called a "bill of indictment." After it is found and all the blanks filled out, it is called an "indictment." State v. Ray (S. C.) Rice, 1, 4, 33 Am. Dec. 90.

BILL OF INTERPLEADER.

See, also "Bill in the Nature of Interpleader."

"The definition of 'interpleader,' " said Lord Cottenham in Hoggart v. Cutts, Craig & P. 198, 204, "is not, and cannot be disputed. It is where the plaintiff says, 'I have a fund in my possession in which I claim no personal interest, and to which you, the defendants, set up conflicting claims; pay me my costs, and I will bring the fund into court, and you shall contest it between yourselves.' The case must be one in which the fund is a matter of contest between two parties, and in which the litigation between these two parties will decide all their respective rights with respect to the fund. Thus, a defendant in a strict interpleader proceeding cannot have relief by cross-bill against the claimant." Wakeman v. Kingsland, 18 Atl. 680, 681, 46 N. J. Eq. (1 Dick.) 113.

A strict interpleader bill can only be exhibited where two or more persons claim the same debt, duty, or thing from the plaintiff by different or separate interests, and he, not knowing to which of the claimants he ought of right to render the debt, duty, or other thing, fears that he may suffer injury from their conflicting claims, and therefore he prays that they may be compelled to interplead and state their several claims, that the court may adjudge to whom the debt, duty, or other thing belongs. Wakeman v. Kingsland, 18 Atl. 680, 681, 46 N. J. Eq. (1 Dick.) 113; Sioux Falls Sav. Bank v. Lien, 85 N. W. 924, 927, 14 S. D. 410. It claims no right in opposition to those claimed by the persons against whom the bill is exhibited, but only prays the decree of the court to decide between the rights of those persons for the safety of the claimant. The nature of the allegations, therefore, in every bill of interpleader are: (1) That two or more persons have preferred a claim against the complainant; (2) that they claim the same thing; (3) that the claimant has no beneficial interest in the thing claimed; and (4) that he cannot determine without hazard to himself to which of the defendants the thing of right belongs, and he must bring the money or thing claimed into court, so that he cannot be benefited by the delay of payment which may result from the filing of his bill. Sioux Falls Sav. Bank v. Lien, 85 N. W. 924, 927, 14 S. D. 410 (citing Atkinson v. Manks [N. Y.] 1 Cow. 691; Crane v. McDonald, 118 N. Y. 648, 23 N. E. 991).

A bill of interpleader lies where two or more persons severally claim the same thing under different titles or in separate interests from another, who, not claiming any title or interest therein himself, and not knowing to which of the claimants he ought of right to render the debt or duty claimed, or to deliver the property in his custody, is either molested by an action or actions brought against him, or fears that he may suffer injury from the conflicting claims of the parties. The object of the application to a court of equity is to protect the complainant, not only from being compelled to pay or deliver the thing claimed to both the claimants, but also from the vexation attending upon the suits which are or possibly may be instituted against him. Gibson v. Goldthwaite, 7 Ala. 281, 288, 42 Am. Dec. 592.

A "bill of interpleader" is defined to be a bill exhibited when two or more persons claim the same debt or duty from the complainant by different or separate interests, and he, not knowing to which of the claimants he ought of right to pay or render it, exhibits a bill against them praying that the court may adjudge between them to whom the thing belongs, and that he may be indemnified. It claims no right in opposition to those claimed by the persons against whom the bill is exhibited, but only prays the court to decide between the rights of those persons for the safety of the complainant, so that he may not be damaged by paying the money to a wrong hand. Atkinson v. Manks (N. Y.) 1 Cow. 691, 703.

A "bill of interpleader" is defined to be a bill exhibited when two or more persons claim the same debt or duty from the complainant by different or separate interests, and he, not knowing to which of the defendants he ought of right to pay or render it, fears that he may be damaged by the defendants as by paying his money to a wrong hand, and therefore exhibits his bill of interpleader against them, praying that the court may judge between them to whom the thing belongs, and that he may be indemnified. Atkinson v. Manks (N. Y.) 1 Cow. 691, 703 (citing Coop. Eq. Pl. 456).

A bill of interpleader "is a bill filed by complainant, who seeks no relief against any defendant, but only asks that he may be at liberty to pay money or deliver paper to the one to whom it of right belongs, that he may thereafter be protected against the claims of both. In such case the only decree to which the complainant is entitled is a decree that the bill is properly filed; that he be at liberty to pay the funds into court, and for his costs; and that the defendants interplead and settle the matter between themselves. Filing bills of interpleader ought not to be encouraged, and should never be brought except in cases where the complainant can in no other way protect himself from an unjust litigation in which he has no interest." Bedell v. Hoffman (N. Y.) 2 Paige, 199, 200.

A bill of interpleader is a bill filed for the protection of a person from whom several persons claim, either legally or equitably, the same thing, debt, or duty, but who has incurred no independent liability to any one of them, and does not himself claim an interest in the matter. The object and effect of the bill is to compel such claimants to litigate the question among themselves, so that it may be determined which one of them complainant is under an obligation to. The bill will not lie where the complainant has incurred any independent liability by means of an express agreement with any one of the defendants. Sprague v. Soule, 35 Mich. 35.

A bill of interpleader is a bill filed for the protection of a person from whom several persons claim, legally or equitably, the same thing, debt, or duty, but who has incurred no independent liability to any of them, and does not himself claim an interest in the matter. The equity is that the conflicting claimants should litigate the matter among themselves without involving the stakeholder in their dispute. Bennet v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 17 Pa. Co. Ct. R 181, 190 (citing Adams, Eq. 202).

A bill of interpleader is a bill filed for the protection of a person from whom several persons claim, legally or equitably, the same thing, debt, or duty, but who has incurred no independent liability to any of them, and does not himself claim an interest in the matter. The equity is that the conflicting claimants should litigate the matter amongst themselves without involving the stakeholder in their dispute. McDonald v. Allen, 37 Wis. 108, 111, 19 Am. Rep. 754 (citing Adams, Eq. 202).

A bill of interpleader is where the complainant claims no relief against either of the defendants claiming of him the same debt or duty by different or separate interests, he being uncertain with which of the claims he ought to comply; in which case he may apply to the court, by a bill of this nature, for leave to pay the money or deliver the property to whom it of right belongs, and that he may thereafter be protected from the claims of both. Bird v. Fake (Wis.) 2 Pin. 69, 71.

The purpose of a bill of interpleader is to compel the claimants of the same thing, debt, or duty from the party liable therefor to litigate their respective claims between themselves, the party liable being under no independent liability to any of the claimants, and being merely in the position of a stakeholder, without interest in the matter itself.

By such bill the plaintiff seeks protection from rival claimants and a multiplicity of suits. It is essential in every bill of interpleader that each of the defendants claims a right, and such right as they may interplead for. Pusey & Jones Co. v. Miller (U. S.) 61 Fed. 401, 402.

Jurisdiction in interpleader is founded upon a conflict between two or more persons severally claiming the same debt through separate and different interests, and the person liable to discharge the debt is unable to ascertain which of the claimants is entitled, and he is therefore threatened with two or more suits in respect of a subject-matter in which he claims no interest, and in regard to which he is an indifferent stakeholder. The want of pecuniary interest on the part of the person in possession of the fund is a necessary element to the maintenance of an interpleader, and hence it is held that, where a trustee in possession of a fund would be entitled to commissions on three or four thousand dollars if the deed of trust is sustained, he could not be said to be an indifferent stakeholder without any interest in the subject-matter in controversy, and hence could not maintain a bill of interpleader. National Park Bank v. Lanahan, 60 Md. 477, 514.

A bill of interpleader cannot be maintained by plaintiff, who has a personal interest in the subject of controversy. He must show that he is a mere stakeholder, without any right of his own to be litigated. The object of the proceeding is to determine to which of several claimants the plaintiff shall pay a certain debt or duty, as to which there is no dispute except as to the person entitled to receive it, so that, when their respective rights are settled, nothing further remains in controversy. In this case, where there was a dispute between the plaintiff and the defendants as to whether plaintiff should pay interest on the moneys in his hands, such dispute could not be settled by interpleader, and the bill must be dismissed. Appeal of Bridesburg Mfg. Co., 106 Pa. 275, 276.

One of the essential elements of the equitable remedy of interpleader is that all the adverse titles or claims to the thing or debt in reference to which the bill is filed must be dependent or be derived from a common source. Where there is no privity between the claimants, where their titles are independent, not derived from a common source, but each asserted as wholly paramount to the other, the stakeholder is obliged, in the language of the authorities, to defend himself as well as he can against each separate demand; a court of equity will not grant him an interpleader. Kyle v. Mary Lee Coal & Ry. Co., 20 South. 851, 852, 112 Ala. 606 (citing 3 Pom. Eq. Jur. §§ 132, 324).

To maintain a bill of interpleader, it is necessary the complainant should be uncertain as to whom the right belongs. Howe Mach. Co. v. Gifford (N. Y.) 66 Barb. 597, 600.

The remedy of interpleader is intended for the relief of those only who occupy the position of mere stakeholders and are in danger of being drawn into a controversy in which they have no concern. Wing v. Spaulding, 64 Vt. 83, 86, 23 Atl. 615.

Bills of interpleader do not ordinarily lie except in cases of privity of some sort between all the parties, such as privity of estate, or title, or contract, and where the claim by all is of the same nature and character. But where the claimants assert their rights under adverse titles, and not in privity, and where their claims are of different natures, the bill is wholly unmaintainable. Goodrich v. Williamson, 63 Pac. 974, 980, 10 Okl. 588.

It is well settled that a bill of interpleader will only lie in favor of a plaintiff who has no interest against defendants' claim in privity with each other. Newman v. Home Ins. Co., 20 Minn. 422, 426 (Gil. 378, 381).

An interpleading suit involves two successive litigations; one between the plaintiff and the defendants upon the question whether the defendants shall interplead, the other between the different defendants—that is, the interpleading itself. Roselle v. Farmers' Bank, 24 S. W. 744, 745, 119 Mo. 84.

The nature of the allegations in every bill of interpleader are: (1) That two or more persons have preferred a claim against the complainant; (2) that they claim the same thing; (3) that the complainant has no beneficial interest in the thing claimed; and (4) that he cannot determine without hazard to himself to which of the defendants the thing of right belongs. Atkinson v. Manks (N. Y.) 1 Cow. 691, 703 (quoted in Hasberg v. Mutual Life Ins. Co., 80 N. Y. Supp. 867, 871, 81 App. Div. 199).

The purpose of a bill of interpleader is to ascertain to whom plaintiff shall deliver the property. Steed v. Savage, 41 S. E. 272, 274, 115 Ga. 97.

BILL OF LADING.

See "Clean Bill of Lading"; "Ship's Bill."

Bills of lading have been in common use from time immemorial. They have their origin in mercantile usages and customs. The law in respect to them should be interpreted in the light of those usages and customs as commonly understood by those conducting business in accordance with them. German-American Sav. Bank v. Craig (Neb.) 96 N. W. 1023, 1025.

The office of the bill of lading is to provide for the rights and liabilities of the parties in reference to the contract to carry, and is not concerned with liabilities to contribute in general average. The Roanoke (U. S.) 59 Fed. 161, 165, 8 C. C. A. 67.

A bill of lading is a commercial document, to be interpreted according to the usages of commerce. Consequently shippers could not complain at the discharge of the goods at a certain place in the port of destination, where such discharge was made under the usages of commerce, and the bill itself named no particular place in the port where the delivery should be made. Devato v. Eight Hundred and Twenty-Three Barrels of Plumbago (U. S.) 20 Fed. 510, 515.

As contract of carriage.

A bill of lading is the contract by which the carrier agrees to deliver the goods intrusted to him for transportation to the person named therein, or his order, and if he delivers them to any one else, and loss ensues to the party entitled to receive the goods, he becomes liable. National Bank of Chester v. Atlanta & C. A. L. Ry. Co., 25 S. C. 216.

A bill of lading is an instrument in writing, signed by a carrier or his agent, describing the freight so as to identify it, stating the name of the consignor, the terms of the contract for carriage, and agreeing or directing that the freight be delivered to the order or assigns of a specified person at a specified place. Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 674; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 4198; Civ. Codes S. D. 1903, § 1551; Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 2126; Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 2830.

As contract of carriage by water.

A bill of lading is a commercial document which is the written evidence of a contract for the carriage and delivery of goods sent by sea for a certain freight. Mason v. Lickbarrow, 1 H. Bl. 359. It is a written memorandum, given by a person in command of a merchant ship or vessel, acknowledging the receipt on board the ship of certain specified goods in good order, or "apparent good order," which he undertakes, in consideration of the payment of freight, to deliver in like good order (dangers of the sea excepted) at a designated place to the consignee therein named, or to his assigns. The term is often applied to a similar receipt and undertaking given by a carrier of goods by land. A contract evidenced by such a bill must be interpreted according to the usages of commerce. Devato v. Eight Hundred and Twenty-Three Barrels of Plumbago (U. S.) 20 Fed. 510, 515. But the term is often applied to a similar receipt and undertaking given by a carrier of goods by land. In maritime affairs a writing which is in form of bill of lading, but signed only by the consignor, is not one. Gage v. Jaqueth (N. Y.) 1 Lans. 207, 210. It is the written evidence of a contract between the owner of the goods and the master or owner of the vessel for the carriage and delivery of the goods, at a certain freight, when sent by sea or other public waters. Creery v. Holly (N. Y.) 14 Wend. 26, 28. It is a written evidence of a contract for the carriage and delivery of goods, sent by water, for a certain freight. There are generally three or more parts of the instrument, one of which is usually sent to the consignee by the ship which carries the goods, another which is sent to him by some other conveyance, and a third which is kept by the shipper. Covill v. Hill (N. Y.) 4 Denio, 323, 330. It is a contract of bailment, and, in the usual form of the contract, the undertaking is to deliver to the order or assigns of the shipper. Blanchard v. Page, 74 Mass. (8 Gray) 281, 286, 287 (citing Mason v. Lickbarrow, 1 H. Bl. 359). It is a written evidence of a contract for the carriage of goods by sea, although the term is frequently used relative to similar evidence for contracts on land. Though, as between the shipper of goods and the owner of a vessel, a bill of lading may be explained as to the quantity and condition of the goods, yet it may not be so explained as between the owner of the vessel and a consignee or assignee of the bill who has in good faith advanced money on the strength of it. In such case the bill is conclusive on the owner in respect to the quantity of the goods. Dickerson v. Seelye (N. Y.) 12 Barb. 99, 102. It is a written, simple contract between a shipper of goods and a shipowner, the latter to carry the goods, and the former to pay a stipulated compensation for that service. Blanchard v. Page, 74 Mass. (8 Gray) 281, 295. It "is a contract of carriage for hire, by which the master engages to deliver the goods to the shipper or his order." Rowley v. Bigelow, 29 Mass. (12 Pick.) 307, 313, 23 Am. Dec. 607. It is a contract by which the master engages to carry and deliver goods to the consignee, or to the order of the shipper. It requires the goods to be on board, and they should be on board before the bill is signed. The L.J. Farwell (U.S.) 15 Fed. Cas. 707, 708. It is a contract between the owner of the vessel and the freighters. It is a contract by the master for the owners, and subjects them to all the liability incident to it. Faulkner v. Wright (S. C.) Rice, 107, 116.

The contract between the ship and the shipper is that which is contained in the bills of lading delivered. The copy retained by the ship, or the "ship's bill," as it is sometimes called, is designed only for its information and convenience, not for evidence as between the parties of what their agreement was. If it differs from the others, they must be considered as the true and only evidence of the contract. Where the contract in the bill of lading is to deliver to the shipper "or order," on the indorsement of the bill by the shipper the indorsee became the owner of the goods, and, by the force of the contract with the ship, the goods were deliverable to such indorsee or to his order only. The Thames, 81 U. S. (14 Wall.) 98, 105, 106, 20 L. Ed. 804.

Lord Ellenboro (Dickson v. Lodge, 1 Starkie, 226) said a bill of lading was "nothing more than the declaration of a captain." Bills of lading are not admissible as evidence, in a suit on an insurance policy, to show the loss sustained by the person insured. Paine v. Maine Mut. Marine Ins. Co., 69 Me. 568, 571.

Manifest includes bill of lading.

A "manifest" is a declaration of the entire cargo; a "bill of lading" is a declaration of a specific part of the cargo. A manifest is essentially a summary of all the bills of lading. New York & Cuba Mail S. S. Co. v. United States (U. S.) 125 Fed. 320.

As negotiable instrument.

Commercial men have from time immemorial treated bills of lading as convenient symbols or muniments of title, and as instruments for transfer of title, and they have for that purpose acquired among them a negotiability or capacity to pass from hand to hand by indorsement. Mr. Justice Clifford defines "bill of lading" thus: "Such an instrument acknowledges the bailment of the goods, and is evidence of a contract for the safe custody, due transport, and right delivery of the same upon the terms, as to the freight, therein described; the extent of the obligation being specified in the instrument." Robinson v. Memphis & C. R. Co. (U. S.) 9 Fed. 129, 133 (citing The Delaware, 81 U. S. [14 Wall.] 579, 20 L. Ed. 779).

A bill of lading is, by the custom of merchants, transferable so as to vest in the assignee the title to the goods which the assignor had in them; but if a person, without authority from the owner, ships the goods to another, and takes a bill of lading in his own name, he cannot, by assigning the bill to a third person, divest the owner of his title to the property. Saltus v. Everett (N. Y.) 20 Wend. 267, 272, 32 Am. Dec. 541.

A bill of lading is an instrument well known in commercial transactions. In the hands of the holder it is evidence of ownership, special or general, of the property mentioned in it, and of the right to receive said property at the place of delivery. Notwithstanding it is designed to pass from hand to hand with or without indorsement, and is efficacious in the hands of the holder for its ordinary purposes, it is not a negotiable instrument or obligation in the sense that a bill of exchange or promissory note is. Its transfer does not preclude, as in those cases, all inquiry into the transaction in which it originated, because it has come into the hands of persons who have innocently paid value for it. Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Mc-

A bill of lading is a negotiable instrument, and, when indorsed and delivered, transfers the property to the assignee. McCants v. Wells, 4 S. E. (4 Rich.) 381, 387.

A bill of lading is a symbol of property, and when properly indorsed operates as a delivery of the property itself. Quoting And. Law Dict. In the hands of a holder of a bill of lading it is evidence of ownership, special or general, of the property mentioned in it, and of the right to receive the property at the place of delivery. Neill v. Rogers Bros. Produce Co., 41 W. Va. 37, 56, 23 S. E. 702, 709.

"A bill of lading is understood to be a symbol of the property for which it is given, and when in favor of the consignor, his agent or factor, is transferable by delivery without indorsement, for value, and when so transferred carries with it the property in the goods which it covers." This is according to the law merchant, which prevails in the state of Louisiana as in the state of Missouri. Scharff v. Meyer, 34 S. W. 858, 863, 133 Mo. 428, 54 Am. St. Rep. 672.

The Supreme Court of Ohio, in Emery v. Irving Nat. Bank, 25 Ohio St. 360, 18 Am. Rep. 299, said: "By the rules of commercial law a bill of lading is regarded as the symbol of the property therein described, and, in case the shipper reserves to himself the jus disponendi, he can transfer the title, at any time before the property is delivered by the carrier to the consignee, as effectually by the delivery of the bill of lading as by the delivery of the property itself." Kentucky Refining Co. v. Globe Refining Co., 47 S. W. 602, 605, 104 Ky. 559.

A bill of lading represents and stands for the property for which it was given, and the right and title of such property may pass by an indorsement of the bill, or by a mere delivery thereof, when such was the intention with which the indorsement or delivery was made. Walker v. First Nat. Bank, 72 Pac. 635, 636, 43 Or. 102.

Bills of lading, by the law merchant, are representatives of the property for which they have been given, and the indorsement and delivery of a bill of lading transfers the property from the vendor to the vendee, is a complete legal delivery of the goods, and divests the vendor's lien. Missouri Pac. Ry. Co. v. McLiney, 32 Mo. App. 166, 175 (citing Benj. Sales, § 813).

A bill of lading represents the goods for which it is given, and its delivery passes title as effectually as an actual delivery of the goods, even though the bills are not indorsed. American Zinc, Lead & Smelting Co. v. Markle Lead Works, 76 S. W. 668, 670, 102 Mo. App. 158.

Bills of lading are documents which pass from hand to hand. They enter largely into the commercial business of the world, and the strict rules of the holders must be absolutely maintained, or they will lose a material part of their value as instruments of commerce. The Kirkhill (U. S.) 99 Fed. 575, 578, 39 C. C. A. 658.

A bill of lading is regarded as a quasi negotiable instrument. It symbolizes property which it describes. The assignment of a bill of lading, indorsed thereon, accompanied by delivery of the instrument, passes to the assignee title to the goods, though actually in transit, as completely as if they had passed through the buyer's hands and been delivered to the assignee. Missouri Pac. Ry. Co. v. Heidenheimer, 82 Tex. 195, 17 S. W. 608, 609, 27 Am. St. Rep. 861.

Bills of lading, though transferable by indorsement, are only quasi negotiable. The indorser does not acquire the right to change the agreement between the shipper, which was not in the power of the drawer and consignor. Russel v. Smith Grain Co. (Miss.) 32 South. 287, 289.

A bill of lading, though not strictly a negotiable instrument like a bill of exchange, is a representative of the property itself, and the means by which the ownership and control of the property is transferred; hence the delivery of a bill of lading is in law the delivery of the property itself. Forbes v. Fitchburg R. Co., 133 Mass. 154, 157.

Bills of lading are not negotiable instruments in the full sense that promissory notes are. Yet they are justly styled "negotiable." Among the reasons for this are that they are well-recognized commercial instruments; that, when indorsed in blank, they carry title by mere delivery from hand to hand; and that the community gives credit in reliance on what appears on the face of them. Pollard v. Reardon (U. S.) 65 Fed. 848, 849, 13 C. C. A. 171.

The functions of a bill of lading are entirely different from those of a bill or note. It is not a representative of money, used for the transmission of money or for the payment of debts or for purchases, and it is merely a contract for the performance of a certain duty. It is a symbol of ownership of the goods covered by it, a representative of those goods; but if the goods themselves be lost or stolen, no sale of them by the finder or thief, though to a bona fide purchaser, will divest the ownership of the person who lost them or from whom they were stolen. Bills of lading are to be regarded as so much cotton, grain, iron, or articles of merchandise. They are, in commerce, a very different thing from bills of exchange and promissory notes, answering a different purpose, and performing different functions. Hence a statute making them negotiable in the same manner as bills of exchange and promissory notes are negotiable cannot be construed as intending to change totally their character, put them in all respects to the footing of instruments which are the representative of money, and charge the negotiation of them with all of the consequences which usually attend or follow the negotiation of bills or notes. Under these principles it is held that Hill's Ann. Laws, § 4205, declaring that warehouse receipts shall be negotiable and transferable by an indorsement, does not render such receipts negotiable so as to render parol evidence inadmissible in an action on such receipts to show that the firm issuing the same was in fact acting as agent for defendant. Anderson v. Portland Flouring Mill Co., 60 Pac. 839, 842, 37 Or. 483, 50 L. R. A. 235, 82 Am. St. Rep. 771. See, also, Shaw v. Merchants' Nat. Bank, 101 U. S. 557, 564, 25 L. Ed. 892; Landa v. Lattin, 46 S. W. 48, 50, 19 Tex. Civ. App. 246.

A bill of lading "is the receipt for the conveyance of the cargo of a carrier, and, though it is signed by the master, he does it as the agent of the owner, and it is a contract binding on them. By the bill of lading the common carrier engages to carry and deliver the goods to the consignee or his order. It is the document and title of the goods, and as such, if it be to order or assignees, is transferable in market. The indorsement and delivery of it transfers the property in the goods from the date of the delivery. The function of a bill of lading is different from that of ordinary commercial paper. It is not a representative of money, used for the transmission of money or for the payment of debts; it is merely a contract for the performance of a certain duty, a representation of goods and personal property to be delivered." Lallande v. His Creditors, 7 South. 895, 896, 42 La. Ann. 705.

"A bill of lading is the written acknowledgment of the master of a vessel that he has received specified goods from the shipper, to be conveyed, on the terms therein expressed, to their destination, and their delivery to the parties therein designated. Abb. Shipp. 322. It constitutes the contract between the parties in respect to the transportation, and is the measure of their rights and liabilities, unless where fraud or mistake can be shown. Redf. Railways, 307-309, and notes; Ang. Car. § 223. It has acquired from usage a negotiable character, and the carrier may be estopped, as against an indorsee for value, from showing mistakes in giving it." McMillan v. Michigan S. & N. I. R. Co., 16 Mich. 79, 113, 93 Am. Dec. 208.

A "bill of lading" is not a negotiable instrument in the ordinary sense of those words. Stollenwerck v. Thacher, 115 Mass. 224. An indorsement and delivery of it for value operates to transfer the title to the goods described in it, but not as an assignment of the contract, except by force of some statute, as is now the case in England and some of the states here. Cox v. Central Vermont R. Co., 49 N. E. 97, 100, 170 Mass. 129.

A bill of lading is a nonnegotiable instrument. In Garden Grove Bank v. Hume-ston & S. R. Co., 67 Iowa, 526, 534, 25 N. W. 761, it is said bills of lading are regarded as so much cotton, grain, iron, or other articles of merchandise. They are in commerce a very different thing from bills of exchange and promissory notes, answer a different purpose, and perform a different function. It is not a representative of money used for transmission of money or for the payment of debts or for purchases. It does not pass from hand to hand as bank notes or coin. It is a contract for the performance of a certain duty. True, it is a symbol of ownership of the goods covered by it, a representative of those goods; but if the goods themselves be lost or stolen, no sale of them by the finder or thief, though to a bona fide purchaser for value received, will divest the ownership of the person who lost them. Weyand v. Atchison, T. & S. F. Ry. Co., 39 N. W. 899, 902, 75 Iowa, 573, 1 L. R. A. 650, 9 Am. St. Rep. 504.

A bill of lading is the written evidence for a contract for the carriage of goods. It is only so far negotiable as to protect a bona fide indorsee thereof for value from the exercise by the consignor of the right of stoppage in transitu; but when the bill of lading is obtained by fraud from the owner of the goods shipped, an indorsee, though taking in good faith and for value, can obtain no better title to the goods than the indorser had. Dows v. Perrin, 16 N. Y. 325, 331.

Acts 1876, c. 262, § 1, providing that all "bills of lading, warehouse, elevator and storage receipts, shall be negotiable instruments, unless it be provided to the contrary on the face thereof," does not mean that a mere receipt issued by one engaged in the canning business for goods canned by him, and which were to remain in his possession subject to the order of the purchaser, should be negotiable in the same sense as bills of exchange and promissory notes, and such receipt cannot be considered as a "warehouse or storage receipt" within the meaning of the act. State v. Bryant, 63 Md. 66, 71.

As receipt.

A bill of lading is the ancient, usual, and almost constant indicium of property in goods shipped; and that or some equivalent document is absolutely necessary to enable a vendee to dispose of the goods before their arrival, or for his vendee to demand them from the master of the ship, or to protect the master in delivering them. Ober v. Smith, 78 N. C. 313, 319.

A bill of lading in the usual form is a receipt for the goods or things shipped, and an agreement to carry and deliver the same as stipulated; and, in the absence of any statute, the receipt is merely prima facie evidence of the delivery of the goods, and may be modified or contradicted by parol evidence. A bill of lading is defined by Justice Clifford in The Delaware, 81 U. S. (14 Wall.) 579, 20 L. Ed. 779, as a written acknowledgment, signed by the master, that he has received the goods therein described from the shipper, to be transported on the terms therein expressed to the described place of destination, and there to be delivered to the consignee or party therein designated. The Guiding Star (U. S.) 62 Fed. 407, 411, 10 C. C. A. 454.

A bill of lading "is a written acknowledgment, signed by the master, that he has received the goods described in the bill from the shipper to be transported, on the terms therein expressed, to the described place of destination, and there to be delivered to the consignees, the parties therein designated." The Delaware, 81 U. S. (14 Wall.) 579, 600, 20 L. Ed. 779; Bonito v. Mosquera, 15 N. Y. Super. Ct. (2 Bosw.) 401, 438; First Nat. Bank v. McAndrews, 5 Pac. 879, 880, 5 Mont. 325, 51 Am. Rep. 51; Witzler v. Collins, 70 Me. 290, 300, 35 Am. Rep. 327; The Tongoy (U. S.) 55 Fed. 329, 331.

It is the essence of a bill of lading that it contains a receipt for the goods, with a promise to carry and deliver them, for this the master promises; but it necessarily contains no more. The price of the carriage is usually inserted for convenience, but it is not an essential part of the instrument. The Mayflower (U. S.) 16 Fed. Cas. 1,250, 1,251.

As both receipt and contract.

A bill of lading is twofold in its character. It is a receipt specifying the quantity, character, and condition of the goods received, and it is also a contract by which the carrier agrees to transport the goods therein described to a place named, and there deliver them to a designated consignee upon the terms and conditions specified. The Delaware, 81 U. S. (14 Wall.) 579, 20 L. Ed. 779. As a contract, a bill of lading, like other written contracts, is presumed, in the absence of imposition or mistake, to embody the entire agreement of the parties, and, where bills of lading are silent as to the amount of freight to be paid, the law will imply that the compensation will be reasonable, and such as is ordinarily charged for like service under like conditions. In the absence of fraud, concealment, or mistake, evidence of an oral agreement is inadmissible in controlling such implied provisions. Louisville, E. & St. L. R. Co. v. Wilson, 119 Ind. 352, 355, 21 N. E. 341, 342, 4 L. R. A. 244.

A bill of lading "is an instrument of a twofold character. It is at once a receipt and a contract. In the former character it is an acknowledgment of the receipt of property on board his vessel by the owner of the vessel; in the latter it is a contract to carry safely and deliver." Pollard v. Vinton, 105 U. S. 7, 8, 26 L. Ed. 998; McLeod v. Fourth Nat. Bank of St. Louis (U. S.) 20 Fed. 225.

"The office of a bill of lading is to embody the contract of a carriage as well as to evidence the receipt of the goods, and when the shipper accepts it without objection before the goods have been shipped, and permits the carrier to act upon it by proceeding with the shipment, it is to be presumed that he has accepted it as containing the contract, and that he has assented to its terms, except in so far as it undertakes to limit the general liability of the carrier." Central R. & Banking Co. v. Hasselkus, 17 S. E. 838, 839, 91 Ga. 382, 44 Am. St. Rep. 37.

A bill of lading "is a receipt given by a common carrier for a consignment of goods, and a contract for their transmission. A bill of lading neither makes a title where the shipper has none, nor transfers a title as between shipper and consignee, unless such is the intention of the parties." Minturn v. Alexandre (U. S.) 5 Fed. 117, 118.

A bill of lading "is a receipt given by a carrier for a consignment of goods, and operates both as a receipt and as a contract for the transportation of goods." A bill of lading can properly only be given when there is an actual receipt of the goods, and an executory contract to ship in the future is not properly a bill of lading. The Caroline Miller (U. S.) 53 Fed. 136, 138.

"A bill of lading is both a written acknowledgment, signed by the master, that the vessel has received from the shippers the goods therein described, and a promise to transport and deliver them on the terms therein expressed." The Tongoy (U. S.) 55 Fed. 329.

A bill of lading is a contract including a receipt. O'Brien v. Gilchrist, 34 Me. 554, 559, 56 Am. Dec. 676; Babcock v. May, 4 Ohio (4 Ham.) 334, 347; Stapleton v. King, 33 Iowa, 28, 32, 11 Am. Rep. 109. It is a contract admitting the reception of certain goods, with an agreement to carry them to the port of discharge. Stapleton v. King, 33 Iowa, 28, 32, 11 Am. Rep. 109.

Bills of lading are contracts, or receipts and contracts. The carrier acknowledges the receipt of the property that he carried, states the condition on which he is to carry the property, the person to whom and the place where delivery is to be made, and the rate of compensation for the carriage. This he delivers to the consignor as evidence of a contract between them. By receiving the bill of lading the assignor assents to the terms of the consignment contained in it, and becomes bound thereby, so far as the conditions named are reasonable in the eye of the law. Thus the condition in the bill of lading exempting the carrier for loss by fires, except such as occur by its own negligence, is reasonable and binds the consignor, though he failed to read its terms. Davis v. Central Vermont R. Co., 29 Atl. 313, 314, 66 Vt. 290, 44 Am. St. Rep. 852.

A bill of lading is both a receipt and a contract, and the receipt of the goods for carriage is the basis of the contract of carriage. If no goods are received for carriage, there can be nothing on which the contract of carriage can be based, as the duties and obligations of the carrier with respect to the goods must commence with their delivery to him in a manner that puts upon him the exclusive duty of seeing to their safety. Like all receipts, such bills of lading, so far as they are receipts, may be explained, modified, or contradicted by parol proof. Lake Shore & M. S. Ry. Co. v. National Live Stock Bank, 53 N. E. 326, 329, 178 Ill. 506 (citing Bissell v. Price, 16 Ill. [6 Peck] 408; Hutch. Carr. par. 122; Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Cobb, 72 Ill. 148; Sears v. Wingate, 85 Mass. [3 Allen] 103; Strong v. Grand Trunk R. Co., 15 Mich. 206, 93 Am. Dec. 184; Dean v. King, 22 Ohio St. 118).

A bill of lading is of twofold character; it is a receipt for goods, and a contract for carriage. As a receipt it makes a prima facie case only, and is undoubtedly open to explanation. Planters' Fertilizer Mfg. Co. v. Elder (U. S.) 101 Fed. 1001, 1003, 42 C. C. A. 130.

A bill of lading is an instrument well known to the commercial law, and, according to mercantile use, is only signed by the master of a ship, or other agent of the carrier, and delivered to the shipper. When thus signed and delivered it constitutes not only a formal acknowledgment of receipt of goods therein described, but also contracts for the carriage of such goods, and defines the extent of the obligation assumed by the carrier. A bill of lading signed by the carrier, and delivered to and accepted by the shipper without objection, in the absence of fraud, constitutes a contract for carriage, and binds the shipper, though not signed by him; and a stipulation stamped on the face of the bill of lading before its delivery to the shipper, by its express terms included therein, becomes a part of the contract. The Henry B. Hyde (U. S.) 82 Fed. 681, 682.

"Mr. Justice Miller, in Pollard v. Vinton, 105 U. S. 7, 26 L. Ed. 998, in speaking of a bill of lading, says: 'It is an instrument of a twofold character; it is at once a receipt and a contract. In the former character it is an acknowledgment of the receipt of property on board his vessel by the owner of the vessel, in the latter it is a contract to carry safely and deliver. The receipt of the goods lies at the foundation of the contract to carry and deliver. If no goods are actually received, there can be no valid contract to carry or deliver.'" St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Knight, 7 Sup. Ct. 1132, 1136, 122 U. S. 79, 30 L. Ed. 1077.

A bill of lading has a twofold character; it operates both as a receipt for the goods taken by the carrier, and a contract to deliver such goods at the place and to the consignee named. Wolfe v. Myers, 5 N. Y. Super. Ct. (3 Sandf.) 7.

BILL OF MIDDLESEX.

The word "bill" in the act of 1784 (P. L. 340), enacting that any person who shall keep a billiard table shall forfeit 50 pounds sterling for every such offense, to be recovered by bill, plaint, or information, cannot be construed to mean a bill of indictment. The word "bill" means "bill of Middlesex," the leading process in the King's Bench in England. It is a kind of capias, and answers the same purpose as a capias in the Court of Common Pleas. 3 Bl. Comm. c. 19. And, if the word has any meaning in this country, it must mean the writ of capias. State v. Mathews (S. C.) 2 Brev. 82, 83.

The term "bill," in law language, as used in Act April 2, 1831 (Supp. Rev. Code, c. 88, p. 112), providing that "if any sheriff or other officer conducting an election shall * * * so interfere in the election of senators or delegates, as to show partiality for any of the candidates, he shall forfeit and pay * * * to be recovered by bill, plaint or information in any court of record," etc., distinctly indicates an action by bill of Middlesex in the Court of King's Bench. This "bill of Middlesex" was equally applicable to actions of debt, assumpsit, etc., but as the action of debt is, as has been shown, the most approved action for a penalty, where another is not pointed out, so the word "bill" here would be construed to mean "bill in debt." Sims v. Alderson (Va.) 8 Leigh, 479, 484.

BILL OF PAINS AND PENALTIES.

As bill of attainder, see "Bill of Attainder."

A bill of pains and penalties is a legislative act which inflicts punishment less than death without a judicial trial. Cummings v. State of Missouri, 71 U. S. (4 Wall.) 277, 323, 18 L. Ed. 356; Drehman v. Stifle, 75 U. S. (8 Wall.) 595, 601, 19 L. Ed. 508; In re Yung Sing Hee (U. S.) 36 Fed. 437, 439.

BILL OF PARTICULARS.

A bill of particulars is the appropriate remedy where the party seeks to be fully apprised of the particulars, or circumstances of time and place, of the matters set forth in his opponent's pleadings. Durant v. East River Electric Light Co., 2 N. Y. Supp. 389, 390, 15 Civ. Proc. R. 193; Kelly v. Kelly, 34 N. Y. Supp. 255, 256, 12 Misc. Rep. 457.

A bill of particulars is an account of the items of the claim, and shows the manner in which they arose. It should be as full and specific as the nature of the case admits in respect to all matters as to which the adverse party ought to have information. Bouv. Law Dict. Ferguson v. Ashbell, 53 Tex. 245, 250.

A bill of particulars filed by a plaintiff, or a specification of defense filed by a defendant, is usually a formal document drawn up by counsel after some examination of his client's case, and is made broad enough to cover all which the party can expect in any event to prove, and in most instances, probably, is not signed by the party in whose behalf it is filed. Baldwin v. Gregg, 54 Mass. (13 Metc.) 253, 255. It is a statement of the details or particulars of the claim set up in a pleading, and its office is to apprise the opposite party of the claim made against him, so that he may not be surprised at the trial. Seaman v. Low, 17 N. Y. Super. Ct. (4 Bosw.) 337, 345. It is an amplification of more particular specifications of the matter set forth in the pleading. Starkweather v. Kittle (N. Y.) 17 Wend. 20, 21.

In a bill for the settlement of a partnership account brought to the court of common pleas, the jurisdiction of which is limited to $500, the petitioner alleged that there was a balance due him of between $400 and $500, and prayed that the court would decree that the respondent should pay such sum as should be found due him, not exceeding $500. On a hearing before a committee the petitioner presented to the committee a statement of the partnership account, showing a balance due him of over $500. Held, that this statement was not to be regarded as a bill of particulars. Welles v. Allen, 41 Conn. 140, 141.

"The purpose of a bill of particulars is to give the defendant reasonable notice of the claim he is required to meet, and hence a bill of particulars, in an action to recover for goods sold, showing dates and prices of sales, and describing the property as 'mds.,' was insufficient for failing to show the character of merchandise." O'Hara v. Reed (Del.) 39 Atl. 776, 1 Pennewill, 138.

"The object of a bill of particulars is to specify the plaintiff's claim, and to apprise the opposite party of the distinct grounds and several items of the demand. Evidence of a new claim, or of a distinct matter not embraced in the bill of particulars, cannot be allowed, on the ground of surprise to the other side." Levy v. Gillis (Del.) 39 Atl. 785, 786, 1 Pennewill, 119.

As part of pleading.

A bill of particulars is regarded as an amplification of the pleading to which it relates, and is to be construed as forming a part of it. Bowman v. Earle, 3 Duer, 691, 694. Its object is to inform the opposite party what will be attempted to be proved against him on the trial, so that he may prepare his evidence accordingly, and it has the effect to restrict the proof and limit the recovery to the matters set forth in it. Such a bill may be amended by other pleadings upon terms where it will promote substantial justice. Cudworth v. Gaynor, 44 N. W. 1103, 1104, 76 Wis. 296 (citing Melvin v. Wood, *42 N. Y. [3 Keyes] 533, 4 Abb. Prac. [N. S.] 438).

"A bill of particulars is an amplification or more particular specification of the matter set forth in the pleading, and is designed to restrict the proofs and limit the recovery or set-off to the matters which have been put in issue by the pleadings. When the bill is finished it is deemed a part of the declaration, plea, or notice to which it relates, and is construed in the same way as if it had originally been incorporated in it." Roscoe Lumber Co. v. Standard Silica Cement Co., 70 N. Y. Supp. 1130, 1131, 62 App. Div. 421.

A bill of particulars is an amplification or some particular specification of the matter set forth in a pleading. The declaration, pleading, or notice of set-off may be so general in its terms that the opposite party will not be fully apprised of the demand which will be set up on the trial, and therefore he is permitted to call on his adversary to give a more detailed and particular statement of the claim on which he intends to rely. When the bill is furnished it is deemed a part of the declaration, pleading, or notice to which it relates, and is construed in the same way as though it had been originally incorporated in it. The particulars cannot be evidence against the party furnishing them, in any case or for any purpose, where the pleading or notice to which the bill relates would not be evidence. Starkweather v. Kittle (N. Y.) 17 Wend. 20, 21.

The office of a bill of particulars is to apprise the party of the specific demand of his adversary, and not to furnish him with his proofs or the names of his witnesses. It is, perhaps, in its strictest sense, an amplification of the pleadings, as if the party had alleged generally that he had sustained damages in consequence of some act or another of his adversary, and without disclosing the nature of the act. Marco v. Bird, 53 N. Y. Supp. 411, 412, 24 Misc. Rep. 377.

A bill of particulars is simply an extension of the pleading in relation to which it is ordered, and has no relation to the final judgment. It does not necessarily affect the judgment, but has relation to preparing the issues to be presented to the court upon trial. Raff v. Koster, Bial & Co., 56 N. Y. Supp. 997, 998, 38 App. Div. 338.

Although rule 23 of the Supreme Court only provides for amendments of pleadings, yet for most purposes the bill of particulars is regarded as an amplification of the pleading to which it relates, and is construed as though it formed a part of it; and therefore it seems that, if one served a bill of particulars, the original declaration might be amended under such rule by simply changing the form of the particulars. But a notice served with a declaration containing the money counts, that two promissory notes, of which copies were subjoined, would be given in evidence on the trial, was not a bill of particulars either in terms or legal effect, and an amendment to such notice was not a good and sufficient amendment to the declaration. Chrysler v. James (N. Y.) 1 Hill, 214, 215.

Under Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St. §§ 4904, 4905, declaring that a pleading is a complaint, a demurrer, or a reply, and providing that a first pleading of a plaintiff is a complaint, a bill of particulars cannot be considered a pleading. Dudley v. Duval, 70 Pac. 68, 70, 29 Wash. 528.

To fix mechanic's lien.

"Our statute," says the court in Ferguson v. Ashbell, 53 Tex. 245, 250, "does not prescribe the requisites of the bill of particulars (to be filed in order to fix a mechanic's lien), and, although no precise rule can be laid down which would apply to every case, it may be safe to say that it should be reasonably certain as to the character and amount of materials furnished and the work performed, the dates and place when thus furnished and performed, and the value of the same. An account merely specified as a 'bill of sash and doors' and a 'bill of mill-work' is not an itemized account sufficient to fix a lien, and an account having no date whatever is fatally defective on that ground." Meyers v. Wood, 65 S. W. 174, 176, 95 Tex. 67.

BILL OF PEACE.

Bill quia timet distinguished, see "Bill Quia Timet."

The object of a bill of peace is to suppress useless litigation, to prevent multiplicity of suits, to restrain oppressive litigation, and to prevent irreparable mischief. 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 853. Thus, in actions in ejectment, courts of equity will interfere after repeated trials of the question of title to a satisfactory determination, and grant a perpetual injunction to restrain further litigation. Mitt. Eq. Pl. 116. If the right of the party has been satisfactorily established, it is not material what number of trials have taken place, whether two or more, but the right must have been satisfactorily established at law. 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 859. Accordingly, where it appeared that one had once withdrawn his claim to certain land, once obtained a verdict in his favor, but dismissed his action on the appeal trial after the evidence had been submitted to the jury, and was instituting another suit when the bill of peace was filed against him, the rights of the parties had not been sufficiently established at law to authorize equity to grant perpetual injunction to restrain further litigation. Bond v. Little, 10 Ga. 395, 400.

A "bill of peace" is said to be a bill brought by a person to establish and perpetuate a right which he claims, and which from its nature may be controverted by different persons at different times and by different actions, or where separate attempts have been made to overthrow the same right and justice requires that the party should be quieted in his right. In such a case a court of chancery, in furtherance of the policy of law, would interpose to prevent litigation, and perpetually enjoin those claiming adversely from prosecuting their claims against the person showing himself clothed with the legal right. Ritchie v. Dorland, 6 Cal. 33, 37. Its object is the suppression of useless and vexatious litigation. A bill of peace has been sustained to settle the rights of parties in a single suit, where the questions to be determined were questions of fact, or mixed questions of fact and law; but no such bill can be sustained to restrain one from suing at law where his right depends on a question of law merely, and where the defendant in a suit at law must eventually succeed in law, and it is in his favor. Murphy v. City of Wilmington (Del.) 6 Houst. 108, 138, 22 Am. St. Rep. 345. It is an equitable remedy to determine in one suit what may be or threatens to be the subject of repeated litigation by various persons. "In the note to Woodward v. Seely (Ill.) 50 Am. Dec. 449, it is said bills of peace are of two kinds. To the first class belong those bills brought to establish one general right between a single party on one side and a great number of persons on the other, where such right could not be determined by several suits between the different parties. To the second class belong bills brought between two parties to prevent further litigation of a right after it has been satisfactorily established by one or more trials of law. Bills of the first class require that a community of interest in the subject-matter of the controversy, or a common title from which all the separate claims which are at issue arise, shall exist among the individuals composing the numerous body on the one side, or between one of them and his single adversary, in order to the exercise of the equity jurisdiction, where the bill is a strict, technical bill of peace." Waddingham v. Robledo, 28 Pac. 663, 672, 6 N. M. 347. A bill of peace to prevent litigation is allowed only in case the plaintiff has satisfactorily established his right at law, or where the persons who controvert the right are so numerous as to render an issue under the directions of the court necessary to bring in all the parties concerned and prevent a multiplicity of suits. Elldridge v. Hill (N. Y.) 2 Johns. Ch. 281.

A bill of peace is made use of where a person has a right which may be controverted by various persons at different times, or where several persons having the same right are disturbed, and the court will thereupon prevent a multiplicity of suits by directing an issue to determine the right, and ultimately an injunction. Randolph's Adm'x v. Kinney (Va.) 3 Rand. 394, 395.

Bills of peace are filed where the controversy and its origin possess some ingredient of equitable jurisdiction, such as fraud or accident. Another state of causes is where, though the question be merely legal, yet, in order to prevent endless and useless litigation, a court of litigation will grant a perpetual injunction in repeated and successive trials at law. Town of Huntington v. Nicoll (N. Y.) 3 Johns. 566, 572.

A bill to enjoin the enforcement of a city ordinance imposing a license tax, which alleges, in addition to the illegality of the tax, that, if the city is permitted to proceed to enforce it by the remedies provided, complainant will be called upon to defend a multitude of criminal prosecutions, and will suffer irreparable injury in its business, is a bill of peace. City of Hutchinson v. Beckham (U. S.) 118 Fed. 399, 401, 55 C. C. A. 333.

BILL OF REVIEW.

A bill of review is one brought to have a decree of the court reviewed, altered, or reversed. Citing Bouvier. Dodge v. Northrop, 48 N. W. 505, 85 Mich. 243.

A bill of review "is the technical form whereby the chancellor exercises the prerogative, inherent in him, of modifying his decrees in permitted cases." Jones v. Davenport, 19 Atl. 22, 24, 46 N. J. Eq. (1 Dick.) 237.

A bill of review is in the nature of a writ of error, and its object is to procure an examination and alteration or reversal of a decree made upon a former bill, which decree has been signed or enrolled. Warren v. Union Bank, 28 App. Div. 7, 20, 51 N. Y. Supp. 27, 34 (citing 2 Barb. Ch. Prac. 90); Appeal of Fidelity Ins. Trust & Safe-Deposit Co. (Pa.) 3 Walk. 185, 186; Hyman v. Smith, 10 W. Va. 298, 312; Taylor v. Charter Oak Life Ins. Co. (U. S.) 17 Fed. 566. It is a proceeding in the nature of a writ of error, and which may be brought to modify or reverse a decree given in a suit in equity in favor of the United States for errors apparent upon the face thereof. It has the same scope and purpose that a writ of error has in an action at law—"to procure an examination and alteration on a reversal of a decree made upon a former bill" between the same parties. Bush v. United States (U. S.) 13 Fed. 625, 627 (citing Story Eq. Pl. § 403). It lies only after a final decree. Strictly speaking, a bill of review is a proceeding to correct a final decree in the same court for error apparent on the face of the decree, or on account of new evidence discovered since the final decree. Hyman v. Smith, 10 W. Va. 298, 312.

By Lord Chancellor Bacon's rules, it was declared: "No bill of review shall be admitted except it contain error in law appearing in the body of the decree, without further examination of matters in fact, or some new matter which hath arisen in time after the decree, and not on any new proof which might have been used when the decree was made. Nevertheless, upon new proof that is come to light after the decree was made, which could not possibly have been used at the time when the decree passed, a bill of review may be granted by the special license of the court, and not otherwise." Purcell v. Miner, 71 U. S. (4 Wall.) 513, 521, 18 L. Ed. 435.

The object of a bill of review and of a bill in the nature of a bill of review is to procure the reversal, alteration, or explanation of a decree made in a former suit. If the decree has been signed and enrolled, a bill of review must be filed; if not, a bill in the nature of a bill of review. A bill of this character can only be brought on error in law appearing on the face of the decree, without examination of matters of fact, or on some new matter which has been discovered after the decree, and could not possibly have been used when the decree was made. Mat-tair v. Card, 19 Fla. 455, 458.

A bill of review for errors apparent on the face of the record will not lie after the time within which the writ of error could be brought, for courts of equity govern themselves in this particular by the analogy of the common law in regard to writs of error. Taylor v. Charter Oak Life Ins. Co. (U. S.) 17 Fed. 566.

The ground of a bill of review is error apparent on the face of the decree, or new evidence of a fact materially pressing upon the decree, and discovered at least after publication in the cause. Young v. Keighly, 16 Ves. 348, 350. A bill of review lies to have a final decree of the court revised, altered, or reversed, and lies in two classes of cases, viz., upon error in law appearing in the body of the decree itself, or upon discovery of the new relevant, material matter, or material evidence not known prior to the decree sought to be reviewed, and which could not have been discovered by the exercise of reasonable diligence. Ordinarily a bill of review will not lie where the newly discovered evidence is simply confirmatory or cumulative. Custer v. Custer, 17 W. Va. 113, 123 (citing Nichols v. Nichols' Heirs, 8 W. Va. 174).

A bill of review corresponds with and is in the nature of a writ of error in an action at law, and can only be introduced for the purpose of impeaching, and reversing or modifying, in whole or part, an original decree on account of errors in law apparent on its face. A bill of review cannot be sustained on the ground that the court decided wrong on a question of fact, nor for wrong inferences of the court on matters of fact, nor on the ground that the original decree was not warranted by the facts. Maxwell Land Grant & Ry. Co. v. Thompson, 1 N. M. 603, 605.

The object of a bill of review is to procure the reversal, alteration, or explanation of a decree made in a former suit on the ground of error of law apparent or newly discovered matter. A bill which concedes the correctness of the former decree, and in no wise questions it or seeks to review it, and does not ask a rehearing of the former suit, cannot be considered a bill of review. Wallace v. Goodlett, 58 S. W. 343, 344, 104 Tenn. 670.

A bill of review ordinarily lies to reverse or modify a decree for error in law apparent upon its face, or on account of the facts discovered since the decree. Adamski v. Wiczorek, 48 N. E. 951, 170 Ill. 373.

As part of original proceeding.

A bill of review is an independent proceeding, and does not constitute a part of the original proceeding. Cole v. Miller, 32 Miss. 89, 100.

Petition for rehearing distinguished.

A bill of review based on newly discovered evidence is designed to accomplish the same purpose as a petition for a rehearing in chancery or a motion for a new trial at law. Such a petition or motion must, however, be filed or made during the term, while a bill of review is filed only after the term at which the decree was entered. Watts v. Rice, 61 N. E. 337, 339, 192 Ill. 123.

Writ of error distinguished.

A bill of review is prosecuted to reverse a decree of the same court, while a writ of error is to reverse the judgment of an inferior court. The rights of the parties in both cases have been determined by a competent tribunal, and the object of the proceedings in both cases is to reverse the judgments. Longworth v. Sturges, 4 Ohio St. 690, 707.

BILL OF REVIVOR.

A bill of revivor is one which is brought to continue a suit which has abated before its final consideration, as for example, by death. Clarke v. Mathewson, 37 U. S. (12 Pet.) 164, 171, 9 L. Ed. 1041.

A bill of revivor is but a continuation of the original suit, and, if the plaintiff was competent to sue the defendant in the circuit court, his administrator, though a citizen of the same state as the defendant, may revive it. Brooks v. Laurent (U. S.) 98 Fed. 647, 652, 39 C. C. A. 201.

BILL OF REVIVOR AND SUPPLEMENT.

"A bill of revivor and supplement is a compound of a supplemental bill and bill of revivor, and not only continues the suit which has abated by the death of a plaintiff, but supplies any defects in the original bill arising from subsequent events, so as to entitle the plaintiff to relief on the whole merits of the case." Westcott v. Cady (N. Y.) 5 Johns. Ch. 334, 342, 9 Am. Dec. 306.

"A bill of revivor and supplement is said to be a compound of a supplemental bill and bill of revivor, and it not only continues a suit which has abated, but supplies any defects in the original bill arising from subsequent events; and where a complainant has a right to revive a suit he may add to the bill of revivor such supplemental matter as is proper to be added, but the supplemental matter must have been newly discovered and verified by affidavit, and may be demurred to by the defendant." Bowie v. Minter, 2 Ala. 406, 411.

BILL OF RIGHTS.

The term "bill of rights" is derived primarily from 2 St. Wm. & Mary, c. 2, and was so called because that statute declared the rights of a British subject. The object of that statute, as well as of every British statute of a like kind, was to operate as a limitation on the powers of the crown, and secure from encroachment the ascertained and declared rights of the subject. As used in this country, the Bill of Rights contains the political aphorisms, general principles, and fundamental ideas of free government, and is usually made a part of the Constitution of the state and reserved from legislative action, so that the people themselves shall retain the exclusive right either to modify or disregard it. Eason v. State, 11 Ark. (6 Eng.) 481, 491.

Bills of rights "are the enumeration of certain great political truths essential to the existence of free government. They are not to be regarded as a mere compilation of glittering generalities, for many of their sections are clear, precise, and definite limitations on the powers of Legislature and every other officer and agency of the people. They limit the power of the Legislature, and no acts of that body can be sustained which conflicts with them." Atchison Street Ry. Co. v. Missouri Pac. Ry. Co., 3 Pac. 284, 31 Kan. 661.

An American "bill of rights" is a declaration of private rights reserved in a grant of public powers—a reservation of a limited individual sovereignty, annexed to and made a part of a limited form of government established by the independent, individual action of the voting class of the people. The general purpose of such a bill of rights is to declare those fundamental principles of the common law, generally called the "principles of English constitutional liberty," which the American people always claimed as their English inheritance, and the defense of which was their justification of the War of 1776. Jones v. Robbins, 74 Mass. (8 Gray) 329, 343, 344. All, or nearly all, the guaranties and prohibitions of our Bill of Rights were supposed to be necessary here because they had been necessary in England. Many of them were originally taken almost literally from English documents (constitutional in the English sense), where they had been recorded, after violent controversies; as authoritative acknowledgments and affirmations of ancient English liberties. The specification of many of them is due to particular events in English history, which from time to time called for declarations and guaranties that introduced no new principle. Innovation was always disclaimed. When some peculiar violation of an ancient general right was resisted and suppressed as an innovation, so much of the violated right as was vindicated on that occasion was put on record, and solemnly declared to be the undoubted and immemorial birthright of Englishmen. Details of this kind, occupying much space in American bills of rights, and, by their historical associations, engrossing attention and magnifying their apparent importance, have been influential in disseminating the idea that broad and comprehensive rights of life, liberty, and property, expressly declared to be natural, essential, and inherent, and reserved in the organic law, are not constitutional rights, and cannot be practically upheld by the court (Sedg. St. & Const. Law [2d Ed.] 153, 154, 407) in any other cases than those mentioned in accompanying specifications that do not profess to comprise the entire reservation, and are necessarily partial and imperfect because they were drawn with reference to particular instances or modes of infringing or securing the general rights reserved. Specifications and details of administration, inserted by reason of an anxiety to strengthen the sweeping reservation of essential rights, do not deduce that reservation to an abstraction, nor limit the extent or energy of its operation. They illustrate its power by practical examples, they require its continued application to such cases as the principle of it has been applied to on certain great historical occasions, they prohibit particular violations, they furnish particular safeguards; instead of destroying the general reservation, they re-enforce it. Orr v. Quimby, 54 N. H. 590, 613.

BILL OF SALE.

A bill of sale is a writing evidencing the transfer of personal property from one person to another. The nature of the writing would seem to require that it contain some statement of the fact of transfer. We think it will be found that all the informal writings treated by our court as bills of sale refer to the property as having been bought. Where defendant sold a bicycle to plaintiff, a written instrument executed by him to plaintiff reciting: "Terms cash. P. to M., dr., one bicycle, $47.50, paid July 27, 1896"—was not sufficient to constitute a bill of sale, since it did not contain words importing a transfer of title, but was merely a receipted statement of account. Putnam v. McDonald, 47 Atl. 159, 72 Vt. 4.

Testator's will mentioned bills of sale which a debtor had made to the testator "to prevent his creditors from sacrificing his property," and directed his executors, upon a settlement and payment of the balance due from the debtor, to release the bills of sale. Held that, it appearing that the testator held a mortgage on land of a debtor, the phrase "bills of sale" should be construed as meaning such mortgage. Breckinridge v. Waters' Heirs, 34 Ky. (4 Dana) 620, 622.

Assignment for creditors distinguished.

There is a broad and well-defined distinction between a general assignment for the benefit of creditors, and a deed or bill of sale. The former is a transfer by a debtor of his property to another, in trust, to sell and convert into money, and distribute the proceeds among his creditors, and it implies a trust, and contemplates the intervention of a trustee. The others import an absolute sale and transfer of the title, to be held and enjoyed by the purchaser without any attending trust. A written instrument by a debtor to a creditor, purporting to be a bill of sale of all the debtor's property, which is worth more than the creditor's claims, and which states that the property is sold in consideration of the indebtedness due the creditor, and to secure other creditors, is not a bill of sale, either as collateral or absolute security, but an attempted assignment for the benefit of creditors. Young v. Stone, 70 N. Y. Supp. 558, 561, 61 App. Div. 364.

Chattel mortgage distinguished.

An instrument conveying chattels, which provides that it is to be void on repayment of the consideration within a certain time, is not a bill of sale, but a chattel mortgage, though it provides that the sale is to become absolute, and the title is to pass without any legal process, on the seller's failure to make such payment, and though it is described as a bill of sale; and hence it is within 2 Sayles' Civ. St. art. 338, requiring chattel mortgages to be registered, to be valid against creditors. Williams v. Farmers' Nat. Bank, 56 S. W. 261, 22 Tex. Civ. App. 581. See, also, Musser v. King, 59 N. W. 744, 746, 40 Neb. 892, 42 Am. St. Rep. 700.

Where a debtor by a written instrument transfers personal property to his creditor, and delivers possession of such property to him, with authority to sell, and, after paying all prior incumbrances, applies the excess to the payment of his own claim, no definite price being fixed for the property between the parties to the instrument, the writing is not a bill of sale, even though the words "bargain, sell, transfer, and deliver" are used therein, but such instrument will be construed to be a deed of trust or a chattel mortgage. A bill of sale of chattels, absolute on its face, may be shown, even by those not parties to it, to be a security for mortgage, void against subsequent lienholders, unless filed as required by law, or unless possession of the property be given to the mortgagee, and such possession be actual and continuous. Greenville Nat. Bank v. Evans-Snyder-Buel Co., 60 Pac. 249, 260, 9 Okl. 353.

BILL QUIA TIMET.

"Bills quia timet are also known in the practice of equity as 'writs of prevention,' and are used to accomplish the ends of precautionary justice. The name of this bill is taken from the expression of the party's fears in the application. He fears some future probable injury to his life or interest, and not because an injury has already occurred which requires relief. His object is to secure the preservation of property to its appropriate uses, where there is future or contingent danger of its being diminished, or lost by gross neglect, without the interposition of the court. It generally relates to personal property, and is applicable as against executors, administrators, trustees, and corporations, where there is danger of devastation, waste, or collusion, by which estates may be diminished, and where the appointment of a receiver is necessary." Bailey v. Southwick (N. Y.) 6 Lans. 356, 364. See, also, Southern R. Co. v. North Carolina R. Co. (U. S.) 81 Fed. 595, 598.

Actions to cancel instruments and remove clouds are purely preventive remedies for avoiding apprehended injuries which may be occasioned to the plaintiff by reason of some action which may be taken in the future by the defendant under and by virtue of the instrument alleged to be a cloud. Town of Mt. Morris v. King, 40 N. Y. Supp. 709, 712, 8 App. Div. 495.

Bills quia timet are bills, in the nature of writs of prevention, to accomplish the ends of precautionary justice. They are ordinarily applied to prevent wrongs or anticipated mischiefs. The party seeks the aid of equity because he fears some future probable injury to his rights or interests, and not because any injury has already occurred which requires compensation or any other relief. Bryant v. Peters, 3 Ala. 160, 169.

A bill quia timet "is a bill filed by one who is apprehensive of being subjected to some future inconvenience, probable or even possible to happen, or to be occasioned by the neglect, inadvertence, or culpability of another, as where any property is bequeathed to one after the death of another, and which the former is desirous of having secured safely for his use, or where a surety is fearful of injury from a neglect of his principal to pay the debt." Randolph's Adm'x v. Kinney (Va.) 3 Rand. 394, 398.

Bill of peace distinguished.

"A bill quia timet, or to remove a cloud on the title of real estate, differs from a bill of peace in that it does not seek so much to put an end to vexatious litigation respecting the property, as to prevent future litigation by removing existing causes of controversy as to its title. It is brought in view of anticipated wrongs or mischief, and the jurisdiction of the court is invoked because the party fears future injury to his rights or interests." Holland v. Challen, 3 Sup. Ct. 495, 498, 110 U. S. 15, 28 L. Ed. 52; Northern Pac. R. Co. v. Amacker (U. S.) 49 Fed. 529, 536, 1 C. C. A. 345; Roman Catholic Archbishop v. Shipman, 11 Pac. 343, 344, 69 Cal. 586.

BILL RECEIVABLE.

Bills receivable are promissory notes, bills of exchange, bonds, and other evidence of securities which a merchant or trader holds, and which are payable to him. State v. Robinson, 57 Md. 486, 501.

BILL RENDERED.

The term "bill rendered," as used in books of account, is to be construed to mean as rendered at the date when such accounts were assigned of articles delivered before the assignment and in satisfaction of the account. Hill v. Hatch, 11 Me. (2 Fair.) 450, 455.

BILLED STRAIGHT.

"Billed straight" means that the goods were billed to a particular person, and not to order. Forbes v. Boston & L. R. Co., 133 Mass. 154, 157.

BILLETS.

"Ingots" or "billets" of steel are the steel bars when taken from the molds of a steel manufactory, the words being applied to the finished product as it is ready for shipping. Illinois Steel Co. v. Bauman, 53 N. E. 107, 108, 178 Ill. 351, 69 Am. St. Rep. 316.

BILLIARDS.

Under an ordinance forbidding the keeping of a billiard saloon from allowing minors "to play billiards" the words do not mean to play a game of billiards for wager, and it is not necessary for the owner of the billiard table to allow more than one minor to play billiards in order to constitute the offense. State v. Ward, 57 Ind. 537, 538.

It is held that a statute licensing billiard tables is only intended to legalize the game of billiards proper, in the popular and commonly received acceptation of that term, and not to authorize other games for which a billiard table is not commonly understood to have been designed, but which may be played thereon, even though they may be regarded as a species of or included under some of the several varieties of billiards. Barker v. State, 12 Tex. 273, 277.

Pool included.

"Billiards," as used in 2 Rev. St. 1876, p. 484, § 1, providing that if any person owning or having the care and management or control of any billiard table, who shall allow any minor to play billiards, etc., is not a generic term broad enough to cover any game that may be played on a billiard table, but includes only the ordinary game of billiards, which is played with three or four balls only, and does not include the game ordinarily known as "pool," which is played with fifteen balls. Squier v. State, 66 Ind. 317, 318.

"Billiards" is described in Webster's Unabridged Dictionary (1870 Ed.) as a game played on a table having pockets at the sides and corners of the table, and so includes pool. Sikes v. State, 67 Ala. 77, 80.

"Billiards," as used in a statute permitting the playing of billiards, means the game called "billiards" as then known and played in the United States, and does not include the game of pin pool, though such game would be regarded in Cuba and in Mexico as billiards. Smith v. State, 17 Tex. 191, 192.

As sport.

See "Sport."

BILLIARD ROOM.

Every building or space where bowls are thrown, or where games of billiards or pool are played, and that are open to the public with or without price, shall be regarded as a bowling alley or billiard room, respectively, within the meaning of the war revenue act of 1893. U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 2288.

BILLIARD TABLE.

A billiard table erected and used merely for the purposes of amusement is liable to a tax imposed on "billiard tables" in the same way as if used for the purposes of gaming. Sears v. West, 5 N. O. 291, 292, 3 Am. Dec. 694.

Rev. Code, art. 12, § 8, providing that any person or persons keeping or exhibiting a billiard table without first obtaining a license, which is kept for private use, shall be fined, etc., means that the table is kept for the use of the owner or such persons as he may choose to invite, and that it is not accessible to any one who may choose to play a game on it. Schmetzer v. State, 63 Md. 420, 422.

The authority to license the keeping of billiard tables gives authority to regulate through the license, which is of itself a species of regulation, and authorizes police regulation of billiard or pool rooms. State v. Pamperin, 44 N. W. 251, 252, 42 Minn. 320.

Under a charter authorizing a city to regulate "billiard tables" on which games are played for amusement, the city has the power to regulate not only the tables on which the game is played, but the halls or rooms in which they are kept. City of Tarkio v. Cook, 25 S. W. 202, 203, 120 Mo. 1, 41 Am. St. Rep. 678.

Faro table.

The court cannot judicially know that a billiard table is not a table where the game of faro is usually played. State v. Price, 12 Gill & J. 260, 263, 37 Am. Dec. 81.

As a gaming table.

Keeping a billiard table, even though the loser pays for the use of the billiard table, is not keeping a gaming table. People v. Forbes, 4 N. Y. Supp. 757, 758, 52 Hun. 30.

Pool table included.

"Billiard table," as used in Code, § 4213, prohibiting saloon keepers from permitting minors to play on "billiard tables," includes all tables with or without pockets on which the game of billiards could be or was played, and tables which were usually used in playing the game of pool. Sikes v. State, 67 Ala. 77, 80.

BIND.

See, also, "Bound."

The terms "bind," "bound," "binding effect," and "obligation" are often used by the most responsible jurists without meaning to have them applied to bonds, in the technical language of the law. Stone v. Bradbury, 14 Me. (2 Shep.) 185, 193.

In Common Law Procedure Act 1854, § 62, providing that the service of the order on the garnishee shall bind such debts in his hands, is to be construed as not changing the property or giving even an equitable property, either by way of mortgage or lien, but as putting the debt in the same situation as goods when the writ was delivered to the sheriff under execution. The word "bind" means that the debtor, or those claiming under him, shall not have power to convey or do any act as against the right of the party in whose favor the debt is bound, and gives a security as distinguished from a lien. Holmes v. Tutton, 5 El. & Bl. 65, 80.

As promise to pay.

In an instrument seeking to bind a married woman, with the consent of her husband, in connection with certain notes executed by her, stating that she "does hereby charge and specifically bind her following separate estate for the payment of all her aforesaid obligations, and any and all renewals thereof," "bind," means no more than if used in a simple promissory note, which might have been signed by the married woman for the purpose of charging her separate estate, and cannot be held to be a word of conveyance. Wachovia Nat. Bank v. Ireland, 37 S. E. 223, 224, 127 N. C. 238.

In an agreement to pay certain money, "to which payment well and truly to be made I bind myself," the word "bind" sufficiently imports a promise to support an action. Douglas v. Hennessy, 10 Atl. 583, 584, 15 R. I. 272.

BINDERS.

Binders are the secondary or inside wrapper of tobacco, holding together the loose materials which constitute the filling. Falk v. Robertson, 11 Sup. Ct. 41, 42, 137 U. S. 225, 34 L. Ed. 645.

BINDING EFFECT.

The terms, "bind," "bound," "binding effect," and "obligation" are often used by the most responsible jurists without meaning to have them applied to bonds, in the technical language of the law. Stone v. Bradbury, 14 Me. (2 Shep.) 185, 193.

BINDING OR TAPE.

A narrow woven tape of cotton, used largely for covering the seams of underwear and waists, is a binding or tape, dutiable under Tariff Act July 24, 1897, c. 11, § 1, Schedule I, par. 320, 30 Stat. 179 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1661], placing a 45 per cent. duty on bindings or tape. A. Steinhardt & Bro. v. United States (U. S.) 121 Fed. 442, 443.

BINDING TRANSACTION.

A binding transaction requires the free and conscious action of the party's mind upon its subject. Thus, where the managing officer and principal stockholder of a bank, while acting in a fiduciary capacity for its customers, by means of concealment and false representations induces the latter to invest in bonds, bought and held by the bank for speculative purposes, in reliance wholly on his representation that they were first-class securities, and that he had got them for her expressly, when in fact they were second mortgage bonds, and were sold at a profit, the customer may rescind the transaction, and recover from the bank the money received therefor. Carr v. National Bank & Loan Co., 60 N. E. 649, 650, 167 N. Y. 375, 82 Am. St. Rep. 725.

BIRDS.

Where an act was entitled "An act to provide for the protection of game, wild fowl and birds," the words "wild fowl and birds" will be presumed to have been added to the word "game" for the reason that game will be understood in its sense of including all game birds, game fowl, and game animals, and hence were intended to include species of wild fowl and birds not covered by the word game. Meul v. People, 64 N. E. 1106, 1107, 198 Ill. 253.

BIRDS OF WARREN.

Grouse are not "birds of warren." Duke of Devonshire v. Lodge, 7 Barn. & C. 36.

BIRTH.

See "Actual Birth."

"It is an established maxim," says Mr. Madison, "that birth is a criterion of allegiance. Birth, however, derives its force sometimes from place, and sometimes from parentage; but, in general, place is the most certain criterion; it is what applies in the United States." Two things usually concur to create citizenship: First, birth locally within the dominions of the sovereign; secondly, birth within the protection and obedience, or, in other words, within the allegiance of the sovereign. Opinion of Judge, 44 Me. 521, 523 (quoting Ingils v. Trustees of Sailor's Snug Harbor, 28 U. S. [3 Pet.] 99, 155, 7 L. Ed. 617).

BISECTING METHOD.

As used by surveyors for the purpose of determining the center of a section of land, the bisecting method is a method pursued by running a line from the quarter corner on the east to the quarter corner on the west side of the section, or vice versa, and the point half way on said line between said corners is the center. Gerke v. Lucas, 60 N. W. 538, 539, 92 Iowa, 79.

BISHOP.

See "Coadjutor Bishop."

The English phrase "bishop," derived from the Saxon "Bircop," means to oversee. People v. Steele, 6 N. Y. Leg. Obs. 54, 59.

Archbishop.

In a transfer tax law, exempting from the tax property devised or bequeathed to a bishop, the term "bishop" will be held to include an archbishop, or the cardinal archbishop. In re Kelly's Estate, 60 N. Y. Supp. 1005, 1006, 29 Misc. Rep. 169.

BITCH.

The term "bitch" is at times a common street expletive, and may have reference to several different phases of character, and the intent with which the word is used depends upon the circumstances, and may mean no more than a violent, though inelegant, expression of contempt. Schurick v. Kollman, 50 Ind. 336, 338; Robertson v. Edelstein, 104 Wis. 440, 80 N. W. 724. Such word is not actionable per se. Jacobs v. Carter, 92 N. W. 397, 398, 87 Minn. 448.

Prostitution imported.

The language, "You are a God damn low-down son of a bitch," though profane, coarse, opprobrious, and abusive, is not obscene and vulgar, inasmuch as the word "bitch," applied to a woman, does not, in its ordinary sense, import prostitution. Shields v. State, 16 S. E. 66, 67, 89 Ga. 549.

The word "bitch" has not any such meaning as "prostitute," in English, and, although used as a term of reproach when applied to a woman, does not charge the crime of prostitution, and is not actionable. A complaint for slander, where the words are alleged to have been spoken in German, charging the plaintiff with being a bitch, and setting forth the same in the German language with an English translation, does not show a cause of action, even if the German words were actionable. K—— v. H——, 20 Wis. 239, 242, 91 Am. Dec. 397.

Want of chastity imported.

The term "bitch" is an opprobrious name for a woman, especially a lewd woman. It has not been thought to imply want of chastity nor to mean prostitute. It is generally held not to be libelous per se to call a woman a "bitch." K—— v. H——, 20 Wis. 239, 242, 91 Am. Dec. 397; Schurick v. Kollman, 50 Ind. 336, 338; Craig v. Pyles, 39 S. W. 33, 101 Ky. 593; Blake v. Smith, 34 Atl. 995, 996, 19 R. I. 476; Craver v. Norton, 86 N. W. 54, 114 Iowa, 46, 89 Am. St. Rep. 346; Shields v. State, 16 S. E. 66, 67, 89 Ga. 549; Roby v. Murphy, 27 Ill. App. 394, 398; Phillips v. Baldwin (N. Y.) 8 Wkly. Dig. 194, 195; Anonymous, 60 N. Y. 262, 264, 19 Am. Rep. 174; McMahon v. Hallock, 1 N. Y. Supp. 312, 48 Hun. 617; Nealon v. Frisbie, 31 N. Y. Supp. 856, 857, 11 Misc. Rep. 12. CONTRA, see Logan v. Logan, 77 Ind. 558, 561, 564; Riddell v. Thayer, 127 Mass. 487, 490; Scott v. McKinnish, 15 Ala. 662, 664.

The word "bitch" is synonymous with "wench" or "hussy," and often implies lewdness. Bailey v. Bailey, 63 N. W. 341, 342, 94 Iowa, 598.

BITTERS.

See "Intoxicating Bitters."

Where the purpose of the prohibitory liquor laws is to promote the cause of temperance and prevent drunkenness, the evil to be redeemed is the use of intoxicating liquors as a beverage rather than as an ingredient of medicines and articles for the toilet or for culinary purposes. There may be cases where the bona fide use of a moderate quantity of spirituous liquor in a medicinal tonic would not alone bring a beverage within a statute prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors. This question is exhaustively discussed in the Intoxicating Liquor Cases, 25 Kan. 751, 37 Am. Rep. 284. The Kansas statute prohibited the sale of "all liquors and mixtures, by whatever name called, that will produce intoxication." It was held not to embrace standard medicines and toilet articles, not ordinarily used as beverages, such as tincture of gentian, bay rum, and essence of lemon, although containing alcohol. Whether it embraced certain cordials or bitters was held to be a question of fact dependent on the evidence as to their intoxicating qualities and ordinary use. It was said that "bay rum, cologne, paregoric, and tinctures generally all contain alcohol, but in no fair or reasonable sense are they intoxicating liquors or mixtures thereof." And as to the cordials and bitters the question was said to be one of fact, which should be referred to the jury. "If the compound or preparation," said the court, "be such that the distinctive character and effect of intoxicating liquor are gone, that its use as an intoxicating beverage is practically impossible by reason of the other ingredients, it is not within the statute. The mere presence of the alcohol does not bring the article within the prohibition. The influence of the alcohol may be counteracted by the other elements, and the compound be strictly and fairly only a medicine. On the other hand, if the intoxicating liquor remain as a distinctive force in the compound, and such compound is reasonably liable to be used as an intoxicating beverage, it is within the statute; and this, though it contain many ingredients, and ingredients of an independent and beneficial force in counteracting disease or strengthening the system. 'Intoxicating liquors, or mixtures thereof'—this, reasonably construed, means liquors which will intoxicate, and which are commonly used as beverages for such purposes, and also any mixtures of such liquors as, retaining their intoxicating qualities, it may be fairly presumed may be used as a beverage, and become suitable for the ordinary intoxicating drinks." In King v. State, 58 Miss. 737, 38 Am. Rep. 344, the defendants were indicted for selling intoxicating liquor without a license and contrary to law. The article sold was "Home Bitters," a decoction composed of 30 per cent. of alcohol, and the rest of water, barks, seeds, herbs, and other like ingredients. It was alleged by the defendant to have been sold as a medicine. It was held that if the compound was intoxicating, and was sold as a beverage, the jury should convict; but if it was sold in good faith, only as a medicine, they should acquit. It was said: "One authorized to sell medicines ought not to be guilty of violating the laws relative to retailing because the purchaser of a medicine containing alcohol misuses it, and becomes intoxicated; but, on the other hand, these laws cannot be evaded by selling as a beverage intoxicating liquors containing drugs, barks, or seeds which have medicinal qualities. The uses to which the compound is ordinarily put, the purposes for which it is usually bought, and its effect upon the system are material facts, from which may be inferred the intention of the seller. If the other ingredients are medicinal, and the alcohol is used either as a necessary preservative or vehicle for them—if, from all the facts and circumstances, it appears that the sale is of the other ingredients as a medicine, and not of the liquor as a beverage—the seller is protected; but if the drugs or roots are mere pretenses of medicines, shadows and devices under which an illegal traffic is to be conducted, they will be but shadows, when interposed for protection against criminal prosecution." Carl v. State, 87 Ala. 17, 6 South. 118, 4 L. R. A. 380. See, also, Wall v. State, 78 Ala. 417, 418; Ryall v. State, Id. 410. To the same effect, substantially, is the case of Commonwealth v. Ramsdell, 130 Mass. 68.

The word "bitters," in its ordinary acceptation, means a spirituous liquor, and not a drink or beverage of the kind or class known as mineral or soda waters. State v. Dinnisse, 19 S. W. 92, 93, 109 Mo. 434.

Medicated bitters, called "Doctor Wilson's Rocky Mountain Herb Bitters," and containing alcohol, is within the prohibition of a statute against dealers in drugs and medicines selling or giving away intoxicating liquors or medicated bitters. State v. Wilson, 80 Mo. 303, 306.

BITUMEN.

"Bitumen" is a generic term, applied to a large number of natural substances, which consist largely or chiefly of hydrocarbons. This substance may be gaseous, as natural gas or marsh gas; fluid, as petroleum or naphtha; viscous, as the semifluid asphaltum; or solid, as forms of asphaltum. According to McCulloch's Commercial Dictionary, bitumen includes a considerable range of inflammable mineral substances, burning with the flames in the open air, which differ in consistency from a thin fluid to a solid. The term "bitumen," within the meaning of the tariff act placing bitumen on the free list, was held by Wallace, Circuit Judge, in a concurring opinion, to include natural gas, the same result having been reached by the majority of the court by construing natural gas to be a mineral within the meaning of the free list. United States v. Buffalo Natural Gas Fuel Co. (U. S.) 78 Fed. 110, 112, 24 C. C. A. 4.

BITUMINOUS COAL MINE.

The term "bituminous coal mine," as used in the chapter relating to mines and mining, shall include all coal mined in the state now included in the anthracite boundaries. Pepper & L. Dig. Pa. Laws 1894, p. 3150, § 349.

BLACK.

The artificial coal-tar colors employed in dyeing black, either alone or in admixture with other colors generally, dye dark blue shades, which have the appearance of black, and which, when sufficiently concentrated, are commercially known as "black colors." Matheson v. Campbell (U. S.) 69 Fed. 597, 600.

BLACK BOOK OF THE ADMIRALTY.

The Black Book of the Admiralty is a book containing the laws of admiralty, and was originally compiled in the reign of Edward III, and has always been deemed of the highest authority in matters concerning the admiralty, and contains, besides the laws of Oleron, an ample view of the crimes and offenses cognizable in the admiralty, and also occasional ordinances and commentaries on matters of prize and maritime torts, injuries, and contracts. De Lovio v. Bolt (U. S.) 7 Fed. Cas. 418, 420.

BLACK CODE.

The black code was that body of rules and laws existing in the time of slavery, by which the proprietors of inns and public conveyances were forbidden to receive persons of the African race, because it might assist slaves to escape from the control of their masters. Such laws, after the abolition of slavery, could not have such an object, and might be an infringement of the civil laws of the negro. Civil Right Cases, 3 Sup. Ct. 18, 29, 109 U. S. 3, 27 L. Ed. 835.

BLACK PERSON.

The words "black person" are not synonymous with "negroes"; "black person" may include all negroes, but the term "negro" does not include all black persons. The term "black person" is to be construed as including every one who is not of white blood. People v. Hall, 4 Cal. 399, 403.

BLACKBERRY BRANDY.

"Blackberry brandy," as used in an indictment charging an unlawful sale of blackberry brandy, designated a particular kind of brandy, and did not indicate that the liquor was not brandy of some character. Fenton v. State, 100 Ind. 598, 599.

BLACKLIST.

Blacklisting is a part of the paraphernalia of a strike. It may be said to represent the malignant hate and revenge of the parties resorting to it. In its purposes and effects it is closely allied to a boycott. A "blacklist" is defined to be a list of the persons marked out for special avoidance, antagonism, and enmity on the part of those who prepare the list or those among whom it is intended to circulate, as where a trades union blacklists workmen who refuse to conform to its rules; but it is most usually resorted to by combined employers, who exchange lists of their employes who go on strikes, with the agreement that none of them will employ the workmen whose names are on the lists, and comes within the meaning of what is termed a "conspiracy." Mattison v. Lake Shore & M. S. Ry. Co., 2 Ohio N. P. 276, 279, 3 Ohio Dec. 526, 529.

The term "blacklist" would include a so-called quarterly abstract gotten out by a retail merchant's commercial association in which the names of delinquent debtors are printed, and their credit thereby destroyed by such abstracts being sent to other persons engaged in mercantile business who are members of the association, the printing of such names being a representation that the persons whose names were printed were unworthy of credit. Masters v. Lee, 58 N. W. 222, 225, 39 Neb. 574.

BLACKMAIL.

Worcester says in his dictionary that "blackmail" originally meant the performance of labor, or payment of copper coin, or delivery of certain things in kind, as rent, and refers to it as a term in old English law, and contrasts it with blanch-farm or white rent, which was paid in silver. Spelman, in his glossary, attributes the term "black" to the color of the coin; and Jamieson, in his dictionary, attributes it to its illegality. Dean Swift used the word to signify hush money, or money extorted from persons under threat of exposure in print for an alleged offense. Bartlett, in his Dictionary of Americanisms, was the first to confine its meaning to that sense, and to use it in such sense in this country. "Blackmail" is defined in Wharton's Law Lexicon as being money paid to be protected from devastation. The term is not legally confined to extortion by threats or other morally compulsory measures, but includes the influence which arises out of previous dependency and superfluous gratitude to a public officer for merely doing his duty in recovering money or property which was lost, since such influences, when accompanied by the power of playing on the hopes and fears of the party injured, may be as effective as any moral compulsion. Edsall v. Brooks, 26 N. Y. Super. Ct. (3 Rob.) 284, 293, 25 N. Y. Super. Ct. (2 Rob.) 29, 34, 17 Abb. Prac. 221, 226. "Blackmail" (from "maille," French, signifying a small coin) is defined to be a certain rent of money, coin, or other thing, paid to persons upon or near the borders, being men of influence, and allied with certain robbers and brigands, to be protected from their devastation. Whart. Law Lexicon, 101. Substantially we now attach the same meaning to the term. In common parlance and in general acceptance, it is equivalent to and synonymous with "extortion," the exaction of money either for the performance of a duty, the prevention of an injury, or the exercise of an influence. Edsall v. Brooks, 25 N. Y. Super. Ct. (2 Rob.) 29, 33.

"Originally it had a definite, but provincial, meaning, familiar to those who inhabited the country periodically devastated by highway robbers. It was, indeed, the tribute levied by these last on the peaceable and unwarlike inhabitants of the lowlands of Scotland, which, being paid promptly and at regular intervals, was a substitute for complete spoliation. In this country the phrase is sometimes used in a metaphorical sense to signify any unlawful exaction of money by an appeal to the fears of the victim." Life Ass'n of America v. Boogher, 8 Mo. App. 173, 175.

"Blackmail is the extortion of money from a person by threats of accusation or exposure or opposition in the public prints; hush money; bribe to keep silence; extortion of hush money; obtaining of value from a person as a condition of refraining from making an accusation against him, or disclosing some secret calculated to operate to his prejudice. In common parlance and in general acceptance it is equivalent to and synonymous with 'extortion,' the exaction of money either for the performance of a duty, the prevention of an injury, or the exercise of an influence. Not infrequently it is extorted by threats, or by operating on the fears or the credulity, or by promises to conceal or offers to expose the weaknesses, the follies, or the crime of the victim." Hess v. Sparks, 24 Pac. 979, 980, 44 Kan. 465, 21 Am. St. Rep. 300.

A crime may be committed by one who sends a letter conveying a threat of some other person to do the forbidden acts, providing he sends the letter for an unlawful purpose; nor is it necessary to constitute the crime that the threat should inspire fear, or that it should be calculated to produce terror. If the threat be made or conveyed with the view or intent to extort gain, the crime has been committed, however far the threat may have fallen short of its purpose. People v. Thompson, 97 N. Y. 313, 318.

Under the express provisions of Burns' Rev. St. 1894, § 1999, "blackmailing" consists of accusing any person of any crime punishable by law with intent to extort money from such person. Utterback v. State, 55 N. E. 420, 421, 153 Ind. 545.

BLACKMAILER.

To charge a person with being a "black-maller" would be equivalent to charging such a person with being guilty of the crime of "extortion." The words are treated by lexicographers as synonymous "with exaction of money for the performance of a duty; the prevention of an injury or the exercise of an influence; the extortion of money from a person by threats of accusation or exposure; the wrongful exaction of money." Mitchell v. Sharon (U. S.) 51 Fed. 424, 425.

Blackmailing crowd.

The term "blackmailing crowd," when applied to persons keeping a boarding house, is libelous per se, as charging an unlawful act. Robertson v. Bennett, 44 N. Y. Super. Ct. (12 Jones & S.) 66, 69.

BLANC SEIGN.

Blanc seign is a paper signed at the bottom by him who intends to bind himself, giving acquittance or compromise, at the discretion of the person whom he intrusts with such blanc seign, giving him power to fully do that which he may think proper according to agreement. Musson v. United States Bank (La.) 6 Mart. (O. S.) 707, 718.

BLANK.

A blank is a space left unfilled in a written document, in which one or more words or marks are to be inserted to complete the sense. "Negotiable Instruments are frequently delivered for use with blanks not filled, and in respect to such instruments it is held that where a party to such an instrument intrusts it to the custody of another for use with blanks not filled up, whether it be to accommodate the person to whom it was intrusted or to be used for the benefit of the signer of the same, such negotiable instrument carries on its face an implied authority to fill up the blanks necessary to perfect the same; and the rule is that, as between such party and innocent third parties, the person to whom the instrument was so intrusted must be deemed the agent of the party who committed the instrument to his custody in filling the blanks necessary to perfect the instrument. Angle v. Northwestern Life Ins. Co., 92 U. S. 330, 337, 23 L. Ed. 556.

BLANK INDORSEMENT.

See "Indorsement in Blank."

BLANKET.

"Blankets," in general, are used as coverings for protection against outer temperature and influences, and, in common speech, would be understood to refer to things so used. As used in Tariff Act Oct. 1, 1890, par. 393, it does not include thick woven woolen belts or blankets for paper or printing machines. Bredt v. United States (U. S.) 65 Fed. 496, 497.

BLANKET POLICY.

A blanket policy is an insurance policy covering several different articles, and underwriting all of them for a lump sum. American Cent. Ins. Co. v. Landau, 49 Atl. 738, 750, 62 N. J. Eq. 73.

In insurance a blanket policy is one which contemplates that the risk is shifting, fluctuating, or varying, and is applied to a class of property rather than to any particular risk or thing. Home Ins. Co. v. Baltimore Warehouse Co., 93 U. S. 527, 541, 23 L. Ed. 868.

BLASPHEMY.

Blasphemy consists in speaking evil of the Deity with an impious purpose to derogate from the Divine Majesty, and to alienate the minds of others from the love and reverence of God. It is purposely using words concerning God which are calculated and designed to impair and destroy the reverence, respect, and confidence due to Him as the intelligent creator, governor, and judge of the world. It is a willful and malicious attempt to lessen men's reverence of God, by denying His existence, or His attributes as an intelligent creator, and to prevent others from having confidence in Him as such. Blackstone defines "blasphemy" as denying the Almighty's being or providence. Commonwealth v. Kneeland, 37 Mass. (20 Pick.) 206, 213. The principal element of the offense is that it is a public or common nuisance. Young v. State, 78 Tenn. (10 Lea) 165, 166. That the words should be spoken profanely is the very gist of the offense of blasphemy. Commonwealth v. Spratt (Pa.) 14 Phila. 365, 37 Leg. Int. 234.

Blasphemy consists in maliciously reviling God or religion. Wantonly, wickedly, and maliciously uttering, in the presence of others, the words, "Jesus Christ was a bastard, and his mother must be a whore," is blasphemous. People v. Ruggles (N. Y.) 8 Johns. 290, 292, 5 Am. Dec. 335.

BLAST.

See "Short Blast."

BLASTING GELATINE.

Blasting gelatine is an explosive compound, in which nitroglycerin is the active element, and is manufactured as a convenient method for the application of the explosive force of the latter, which in its original state is a liquid. "This material, invented by Nobel, is composed of the liquid and of a small proportion of so-called 'nitro-cotton,' which consists chiefly of those products of the action of nitric acid on cellulose which are intermediate between collodion cotton and gun-cotton." Sperry v. Springfield F. & M. Ins. Co. (U. S.) 26 Fed. 234, 237.

BLEACHING WORKS.

The term "bleaching works," as used in all laws relative to the employment of labor, shall mean any premises in which the process of bleaching yarn or cloth of any material is carried on. Rev. Laws Mass. 1902, p. 916, c. 106, § 8.

BLEED.

The term "bleed," when used in a statement that plaintiff, in an action for libel, was attempting to bleed a railroad corporation, meant "to draw money from; to induce to pay." Patchell v. Jaqua, 33 N. E. 132, 133, 6 Ind. App. 70.

BLENDS.

Blends are liquors produced by the union of several liquors of a high quality. Block v. Lewis, 5 Ohio Dec. 370, 5 Ohio N. P. 392.

BLIND FLUE.

A blind flue is a short flue which extends into a boiler for about six or eight inches behind the flue sheet, and is closed at the inner end. Such flue is located near the bottom of the flue sheet, and opens into the firebox. They are so attached to the flue sheet, that they may be taken out when it becomes necessary to remove sediment or incrustations on the bottom of the boiler. The usual method of attaching blind flues to the flue sheet of a boiler so that they cannot be blown out is to expand the flue on the inside next to the blind flue, thus forming a shoulder which abuts against the sheet. Atchison, T. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Howard (U. S.) 49 Fed. 206, 207, 1 C. C. A. 220.

BLIND SIDING.

By "blind siding" is meant a side track to a railroad where there is no telegraphic station. Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Brown (Tex.) 59 S. W. 930, 932.

BLIND TIGER.

"After the sale of intoxicating liquors had been prohibited, either by special acts or by vote of the people, all sorts of contrivances were resorted to to evade the operation of the law, which came to be popularly known as 'blind-tigers.' They were devices by which a liquor seller sought to ply his vocation, and at the same time to conceal his criminal agency in the selling." Glass v. State, 45 Ark. 173, 176.

A blind tiger is a place where intoxicating drinks the sale of which is prohibited by law are sold in violation of law. Schulze v. Jalonick, 44 S. W. 580, 581, 18 Tex. Civ. App. 296.

In its general acceptation and understanding, the term "blind tiger" means a person engaged in the unlawful sale of intoxicating beverages. It seems that the court will take judicial notice that the phrase has this meaning. Rush v. Commonwealth (Ky.) 47 S. W. 580, 587.

The Standard Dictionary defines a "blind tiger" to be a place where intoxicants are sold on the sly; and "sly" means artfully; dextrous in doing things secretly; cunning in evading notice or detection. A dispensary where intoxicating liquors are openly and publicly sold in a town, in good faith, under color of lawful authority, though in fact operated in violation of law, is not a blind tiger, subject to be abated or enjoined under the provisions of the act of December 19, 1899. Cannon v. Merry, 42 S. E. 274, 275, 116 Ga. 291.

A "blind tiger," using that term to describe a place where liquors are sold on the sly in violation of the law, is a public nuisance, independently of any provision relating thereto. Legg v. Anderson, 42 S. E. 720, 721, 116 Ga. 401.

A "blind tiger," within the meaning of the article punishing the keeping or running of a blind tiger, is any place in which intoxicating liquors are sold by any devise whereby the party selling or delivering the same is concealed from the person buying or to whom the same is delivered. Pen. Code Tex. 1895, art. 406.

BLINDNESS.

Inability, by reason of defective sight, to read ordinary printed matter, is "blindness," within the meaning of the chapter relating to the deaf, dumb, and blind asylum. Pol. Code Cal. 1903, § 2241.

BLOCK.

See "Each Block."

See, also, "Square."

Block of buildings as one building, see "Building."

The term "lots and blocks" must be construed with reference to the subject-matter, and, where used in reference to city property, means such lots and blocks as are appropriated to cities, and such as cities usually have for convenience, and for arrangement into groups with streets and alleys between, which may be larger or smaller in different cities or in different parts of the same city, subject to the general convenience, and generally the words do not include rural subdivisions for agricultural purposes. Webster v. City of Little Rock, 44 Ark. 536, 551.

There is no such governmental subdivision of a section as a "block." So that a description in a deed as "lot 56, block 12, section 7," is too indefinite and uncertain to warrant a decree for specific performance. Glos v. Wilson, 64 N. E. 734, 735, 198 Ill. 44.

As land inclosed by streets.

"Block," as used in describing urban premises, means a square or portion of a city inclosed by streets, whether occupied by buildings or composed of vacant lots. Fraser v. Ott, 30 Pac. 793, 794, 95 Cal. 661.

The word "block" is defined by the Century Dictionary and Webster as "a square or portion of a city inclosed by streets, whether occupied by buildings or not." In City of Ottawa v. Barney, 10 Kan. 270, Mr. Justice Brewer, in referring to the above definition, said: "We are well satisfied with the definition, and, taking it as our guide in this decision, it follows, as a matter of course, that the word 'square,' used by the complainant, is synonymous with the word 'block.'" In Olsson v. City of Topeka, 42 Kan. 709, 712, 21 Pac. 219, the question arose again, and in that case the court, affirming its former decision, said, although a square be cut into blocks by an alley running through it, yet these blocks are not, in fact, to be considered "blocks," as that term is synonymous with "squares." In State v. Deffes, 44 La. Ann. 164, 10 South. 597, the Supreme Court of Louisiana had under consideration a statute which provided that "no private market shall be established within a walking distance of six blocks from any public market," etc. The court held that the word "blocks" had the same meaning as "squares"; that the terms were interchangeable, and meant squares of the ordinary size. This court has several times used the word "block" as synonymous with the word "square." In Todd v. Kankakee & I. R. R. Co., 78 Ill. 530, it was held that where a town has been laid out into blocks and streets for many years, and the same have always been recognized, treated, and dealt with by the owners and the people as blocks and streets, said blocks should be treated as distinct tracts of land; and that a block in a city is a part of the city inclosed by streets, whether occupied by buildings or composed of vacant lots. The word "block" in a municipal ordinance requiring the consent to the granting of a liquor license of the majority of the property owners, according to the frontage on both sides of the street in the "block" where it is desired to locate a dramshop, means the territory inclosed by the four streets, and is synonymous with the word "square." Harrison v. People, 63 N. E. 191, 192, 195 Ill. 466.

A "block" is defined by the statutes to mean such a block as is bounded by main streets. City Street Imp. Co. v. Laird, 70 Pac. 916, 917, 138 Cal. 27.

Streets included.

"Blocks" as used in Act 1888, No. 116, prohibiting private markets within six blocks of any public market, means six city squares, of 300 feet each, together with the width of the intervening streets of 50 feet each, making a total distance of 2,100 feet. State v. Deffes, 10 South. 597, 44 La. Ann. 164.

In New Orleans City Ordinance No. 4145, providing that no private market shall be established within a walking distance of six blocks of any public market, "block" is exactly synonymous with "square," as used in city ordinance No. 4798, prohibiting private markets within a radius of six squares of any public market. State v. Natal, 7 South. 781, 782, 42 La. Ann. 612.

BLOCK OF SURVEYS.

In popular use, the phrase "a block of surveys" means any considerable body of contingent tracts, surveyed in the same warrantee's name, without regard to the manner in which they were originally located. In a legal sense, the same phrase is employed to describe a body of contiguous tracts located by exterior lines, but not separated from each other by interior lines. Morrison v. Seaman, 38 Atl. 710, 712, 183 Pa. 74.

BLOCK SYSTEM OF LOCATION.

The term "block system of location" was used in Pennsylvania to designate the location of public lands by a person holding a number of warrants for land by a survey of one body of land, including the amount called for in all the warrants. Ferguson v. Bloom, 23 Atl. 49, 144 Pa. 549.

BLOCKADE.

See "Public Blockade"; "Simple Blockade."

A blockade is the exercise of a belligerent right. Before a blockade can be declared a war must exist; and a blockade, lawfully declared, is conclusive evidence that a state of war exists between the nation declaring such blockade and the nation whose ports are blockaded. Grinnan v. Edwards, 21 W. Va. 347, 356.

"A 'blockade,' as the word is understood in the law of nations, is an investment of a town of one belligerent by the force of another." United States v. The William Arthur (U. S.) 28 Fed. Cas. 624, 626.

A blockade, such as to authorize the seizure of vessels, only exists when there is a competent force to prevent the entrance or exit of vessels. No constructive blockade is allowed by international law. The Peterhoff, 72 U. S. (5 Wall.) 28, 50, 18 L. Ed. 564.

There is no rule of law determining that the presence of any particular force is essential to render a "blockade" legally effective. The test is whether it is practically effective, and this is a question, though a mixed one, more of fact than of law. It is sufficient if the force is such as to render ingress or egress in fact dangerous; and a single modern cruiser, whose guns command a circle of thirteen miles in diameter when stationary, is sufficient to maintain a legally effective blockade of a port having a single entrance, like that of San Juan, Porto Rico. The Olinde Rodrigues, 19 Sup. Ct. 851, 852, 174 U. S. 510, 43 L. Ed. 1065.

Dr. Johnson defines a "blockade" to be simply "to shut up by obstruction." In the Imperial Dictionary it is thus defined: "The shutting up of a place by surrounding it with hostile troops or ships, or by posting them at all the avenues to prevent escape, and hinder supplies of provisions and ammunition from entering, with a view to compel a surrender by hunger and want, without regular attacks." The New English (Ox- ford) Dictionary gives this definition: "The shutting up of a place, blocking of a harbor, line of coast, frontier, etc., by hostile forces or ships, so as to stop ingress and egress, and prevent the entrance of provisions and ammunition, in order to compel a surrender from hunger or want, without a regular attack." In the American Encyclopedic Dictionary a "blockade" is thus defined: "The act of surrounding a town with a hostile army, or, if it be on the seacoast, of placing a hostile army around its landward side and ships of war in front of its sea defenses, so as, if possible, to prevent supplies of food and ammunition from entering it by land or water." What constitutes an "effective" blockade cannot be defined with absolute and rigorous precision. Some nations have endeavored to define it by treaty. Prussia and Denmark, in 1818, stipulated that two vessels should be stationed before every blockaded port. An earlier treaty between Holland and the two Sicilies prescribed that at least six ships of war should be arranged at a distance slightly greater than gunshot from the entrance. A still earlier treaty between France and Denmark provided that the blockaded port should be closed by two vessels at least, or by a battery of guns on land. There are no decisions of controlling weight upon the exact point. Sir William Scott, whose rigorous enforcement of the law of prize did not escape the censure of his contemporaries and the criticism of after ages, says, in The Juffrow Maria Schroeder, 3 C. Rob. Adm. 128: "A blockade may be more or less rigorous, either for the single purpose of watching the military operations of the enemy, and preventing the egress of their fleet, as at Cadiz, or, on a more extended scale, to cut off all access of neutral vessels to that interdicted place; which is strictly and properly a blockade, for the other is in truth no blockade at all, so far as neutrals are concerned. It is an undoubted right of belligerents to impose such a blockade though a severe right, and, as such, not to be extended by construction. It may operate as a grievance on neutrals, but it is one to which, by the law of nations, they are bound to submit. Being, however, a right of a severe nature, it is not to be aggravated by mere construction." In The Mercurius, 1 C. Rob. Adm. 69, he says: "For a blockade may exist without a public declaration, although a declaration unsupported by fact will not be sufficient to establish it." In The Henrik and Maria, 1 C. Rob. Adm. 124, he says: "The sight of one vessel would not, certainly, be sufficient notice of a blockade, and therefore it is necessary that it should be signified to me that there was a blockade de facto before that port." The Olinde Rodrigues (U. S.) 91 Fed. 274, 278.

As peril of the sea.

See "Perils of the Sea."

BLOOD.

See "Half Blood"; "Mixed Blood."

To be "of the blood" of any person means to be able to trace descent from some progenitor of that person. This is the common acceptance of the phrase, apart from the theoretical notion which makes "of one blood all nations of men." Miller v. Speer, 38 N. J. Eq. (11 Stew.) 567, 572.

To be of the blood of a person is to be descended from him, or from the same common stock, or the same couple of ancestors. Delaplaine v. Jones, 8 N. J. Law (3 Halst.) 340, 346; Springer v. Fortune (Ohio) 2 Handy, 52, 56.

In a general sense, the being of a man's kindred is being "of his blood," as the word "consanguinity," which is the same as "kindred," imports; but when in addition to being of his kindred, testator requires that the object of his bounty shall be of his blood, he must be understood as speaking of that blood which with some propriety may be called his, namely, that which in tracing an heir is considered as the blood of the most dignity and worth. Leigh v. Leigh, 15 Ves. 92, 108.

Half blood included.

"Blood," as used in a statute directing the distribution of estates among relatives of the blood of the person from whom such estate came or descended, includes the half blood also. "A person is, with the most strict propriety of language, said to be of the 'blood' of another who has any however small a portion of the same blood derived from a common ancestor. At common law the word is used to include half blood, and whenever it is used to express any qualification the word 'whole' or 'half' blood is generally used to designate it, or the qualification is implied from a context and known principles of law." Gardner v. Collins, 27 U. S. (2 Pet.) 58, 87, 7 L. Ed. 347.

A statute providing that no person who is not of the blood of the ancestor or other relations from whom the estate is descended shall, in any of the cases before mentioned, take any estate of inheritance therein, does not exclude a person of the half blood from inheriting, and the word "blood" is used in reference to the ancestor alone, and in its technical and natural sense includes persons of the half blood. Baker v. Chalfant (Pa.) 5 Whart. 477, 479; Beebee v. Gritting, 14 N. Y. (4 Kern.) 235, 241; Cutter v. Waddingham, 22 Mo. 206, 263; May v. Espenshade (Pa.) 1 Pears. 139, 142, 143.

The word "blood," in its technical and natural sense, includes the half blood. In a note to his last edition of his commentaries Kent says the words "in the laws of the several states regulating the descent of ancestral inheritances required that the heir should be of the blood of his ancestor. This would, in the ordinary sense of the words, admit the half blood, for they may be of the blood of the ancestor, though only half blood to the intestate." Kelly's Heirs v. McGuire, 15 Ark. 555, 590.

BLOOD RELATIONS.

All my blood kind, see "All."

"Blood relations," as used in a will providing that the testator's executors should divide the principal of a certain trust fund equally between the testator's blood relations of the degree which the law permits, is equivalent to the word "heirs." Cummings v. Cummings, 16 N. E. 401, 405, 146 Mass. 501.

Primarily the words "nearest blood relation" indicate the nearest consanguinity, and they are perhaps more frequently used in this sense than in any other. Swasey v. Jaques, 10 N. E. 758, 761, 144 Mass. 135, 59 Am. Rep. 65.

BLOOD RELATIONSHIP.

"Blood relationship" is a term of very comprehensive meaning, including those persons who are of the same family stock or descended from a common ancestor. Nye v. Grand Lodge, A. O. U. W., 36 N. E. 429, 436, 9 Ind. App. 131.

BLOW.

A "blow" is defined by Mr. Walker to mean a stroke; and the verb to "mash," of which "mashing" is a participle, means to beat into a confused mass; so that the use of the word "blow" in an indictment for "wound," there being other words used in the same context which show that a wound was given and what kind it was, is not ground for arresting the judgment, as a blow or stroke with a club which has the effect of cutting the left ear and mashing or beating into a confused mass the nose and left cheek of the deceased shows as clearly the means whereby the deceased was killed as if the word "wound" had been used. State v. Noblett, 47 N. C. 418, 433.

The words "blow the furnace with," in a devise, by the owner of a water power and of a furnace and mills, of the furnace, with the privilege of using water to "blow the furnace with," only operates to give the devisee the right to use the power to blow the bellows of the furnace, and does not authorize him to use water for drilling and grinding castings, although such operations are a necessary and incidental part of the business of operating the furnace, without which merely blowing the bellows would be useless. Lincoln v. Lincoln, 110 Mass. 449, 452.

BLOWING OUT.

The blowing out of a reservoir means turning loose the water in the reservoir, so as to discharge the water in such force and violence as to rapidly empty the water held by the reservoir, and also carry away with said water the large quantities of mud that accumulated in the dam. Hunter v. Pelham Mills, 29 S. E. 727, 733, 52 S. C. 279, 68 Am. St. Rep. 904.

BLOWING UP.

Ordinarily the term "blowing up" means to scatter or destroy by an explosion of some kind. When we speak of a building as having been blown up, we ordinarily intend to convey the notion that its constituent parts have been scattered, and the integrity of the structure destroyed. Thus the breaking of plate glass in a store by an explosion of gas in a room, generated from gasoline being used to clean cloths, prior to fire in the building, is not caused by "blowing up of the building," within the exception to the policy. Vorse v. Jersey Plate Glass Ins. Co., 93 N. W. 569, 119 Iowa, 555, 60 L. R. A. 838.

BLOWN GLASSWARE.

Gauge glasses, consisting of hollow glass tubes ready for mounting, are assessable as blown glass ware, within Tariff Act 1897, par. 100 (Act July 24, 1897, c. 11, Schedule B, 30 Stat. 157 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1633]). Rogers v. United States (U. S.) 121 Fed. 546, 547, 57 C. C. A. 608.

BLUDGEON.

A bludgeon is a short stick with one end loaded, used as a weapon. State v. Phillips, 10 S. E. 463, 464, 104 N. C. 786.

BLUE.

A contract for the sale and delivery of a blue Rutland marble headstone is satisfied by the delivery of a stone, though there is a whitish line or streak about a sixteenth of an inch wide running diagonally downward across the stone and through it, in striking contrast with the general color and appearance of the stone, if such streak is not a defect in the stone or arising from the manufacture. Lyndon Granite Co. v. Farrar, 53 Vt. 585, 588.

BOAR.

A boar is an uncastrated male hog. State v. Royster, 65 N. C. 539.

BOARD.

See "Canvassing Board"; "Governing Board"; "On Board"; "State Boards and Commissions"; "Text-Book Board"; "Town Board."

The term "board," as applied to the common council, consisting of a board of aldermen and a board of assistants, may have two meanings, one abstract, having reference to the legislative creation, which is continuous; and the other referring to its members, in which latter, and more important, sense, it is changed by every new general election. The members, of course, constitute the board for all purposes of action, and, when powers are to be exercised, the members legally assembled can alone act. Wetmore v. Story (N. Y.) 22 Barb. 414, 490.

The word "boards," in a bill of sale of lumber, held not used to indicate that the lumber was merchantable, or that it was sold as such, but as a term applied to a particular species of lumber. Whitman v. Freese, 23 Me. (10 Shep.) 212, 215.

Webster in his Dictionary gives this as one of the definitions of the term "board": "A body of men constituting a quorum, a court, or council, as a board of trustees, a board of supervisors, etc." Broadwell v. People, 76 Ill. 554, 558.

The term "board" includes and means the furnishing of the ordinary necessities of life, and must be considered as being synonymous with the word "entertainment." Scattergood v. Waterman (Pa.) 2 Miles, 323.

Under a statute fixing the fees of a sheriff for arresting prisoners and his compensation for boarding them, the word "boarding" does not, as used in the statute, or in its ordinary sense, include the furnishing of fuel. Marion County v. Reissner, 58 Ind. 260, 262.

Under a statute authorizing that, under a plea and set-off, defendant might give in evidence under the general issue his demand for goods delivered, board and lodging are included within the meaning of goods delivered and services performed. Witter v. Witter, 10 Mass. 223, 225.

Agency implied.

Where a combination known as the "Sugar Refineries Company" selected as the transferee of the stock of the corporation so known what was designated simply as a "board," it implied agency, a committee of managers, official servants charged with the executive duties, and acting for and in the interest of others. People v. North River Sugar Refining Co., 24 N. E. 834, 836, 121 N. Y. 582, 9 L. R. A. 33, 18 Am. St. Rep. 843.

Guest relationship.

"The verb 'board' means to receive food as a lodger, or without lodging, for a compensation; and hence an allegation that a person boarded with an innkeeper is merely an averment that he received food from the innkeeper for a compensation, and does not show whether he received such food as a boarder or as a guest." Pollock v. Landis, 36 Iowa, 651, 652.

BOARD MEASURE.

"Board measure" is the number of feet of board a log will yield when sawed. When the seller of logs and those who have a right to collect toll for them do not choose to express their intentions in the contract as to the mode of establishing the board measure, custom and usage furnish an explanation of the unexpressed intention. Destrehan v. Louisiana Cypress Lumber Co., 45 La. Ann. 920, 927, 13 South. 230, 40 Am. St. Rep. 265.

BOARD OF ALDERMEN.

The phrase "board of aldermen," in statutes relative to a municipal corporation, means the governing body of the city. Oliver v. Jersey City, 42 Atl. 782, 783 63 N. J. Law, 96.

BOARD OF ARBITRATORS.

A board of arbitrators is not a court or judicial tribunal, in any proper sense of those terms. It has none of the powers that appertain to courts to regulate their proceedings or enforce their decisions. An award, when made, is more in the nature of a contract than of a judgment. It is but the consummation of the contract of submission; its appropriate and legitimate result. Hence it is held that the fact that a judgment rendered on Sunday is void does not render an award made on Sunday illegal. Blood v. Bates, 31 Vt. 147, 150.

BOARD OF AUDIT.

The board of audit is the tribunal to which the law has committed the adjustment and settlement of town charges, and the purpose for which it was created would be to a great extent defeated if its decisions could be drawn into controversy in courts whenever an error of judgment should be alleged. The boards of audit in allowing accounts are limited to the powers conferred upon them by the statute, and where they transgress its limitations their acts, like those of any other tribunals of limited jurisdictions, are void. Osterhoudt v. Rigney, 98 N. Y. 222, 232.

BOARD OF CIVIL AUTHORITY.

The words "board of civil authority" shall extend to and include the mayor and aldermen of cities. V. S. 1894, 19.

The words "board of civil authority," as used in the title relating to elections, shall mean, in the case of a city, the mayor and aldermen of such city, and the justices residing therein; in the case of a town, the selectmen and town clerk of such town, and the justices residing therein; and, in the case of a village, the trustees or bailiffs of such village, and the justices residing therein. V. S. 1894, 59.

BOARD OF COUNTY COMMISSIONERS.

See "County Board."

Boards of county commissioners are public corporations, invested with subordinate legislative powers, to be exercised for local purposes connected with the public good. Comp. St. p. 153, § 6. As such, they are subject to the legal rules governing these bodies, and must derive all their powers from the law which creates them, or from some other positive statute; but it is to be understood that a corporation is not limited to the exercise of the powers specifically granted, but possesses, in addition, all such powers as are either necessarily incident to those specified, or essential to the purposes and objects of its corporate existence. Chaska County v. Carver County, 6 Minn. 204, 215 (Gil. 130, 137).

A board of county commissioners is a tribunal of special and limited jurisdiction. Its powers are wholly statutory. It must act, if it acts legally and within its authority, in substantial accord with the statute granting its powers. Flint v. Horsley, 66 Pac. 59, 60, 25 Wash. 648.

The board of county commissioners is the body—a quasi corporation—in whom is vested by law the title of all the property of the county. In one sense they are the agents of the county, and in another sense they are the county itself; and in this latter sense they acquire and hold in perpetuity the title to the county's property, and in this capacity they not only act for the county, but also as the county. The "county" and the "commissioners of the county" are often convertible terms, and a devise to the county is a devise to the commissioners of a county, and vests the title in them for the benefit of the county. Carter v. Fayette County, 16 Ohio St. 353, 369.

BOARD OF DIRECTORS.

See "De Facto Board of Directors."

The term "board of directors," as used in the chapter relating to home, life, and accident insurance companies, includes the persons duly appointed or designated to manage the affairs of the company. Rev. St. Tex. 1895, art. 3096a.

BOARD OF FIRE UNDERWRITERS.

It is a matter of common knowledge that, prior to any legislation on the subject, associations called "boards of fire underwriters" (either fire or marine) existed in various states. These were voluntary associations, composed exclusively of those engaged in that particular line of business. Their general object was consolidation and co-operation in matters affecting their common business, just as lawyers, physicians, jobbers, grocers, etc., form associations for similar purposes. They often established at their own expense salvage corps. See 13 Enc. Brit. tit. "Insurance." Also, Enc. Ins. U. S. 1894-95. Held, that as Gen. Laws 1895, cc. 175, 178, did not define the term "board of fire underwriters," reference must be had to the prior history of such organizations in order to ascertain the legislative sense in which the term is used. From such reference it appears that the corporations of that name were composed exclusively of those who, for the time being, were engaged in the business of fire insurance in the city where the board was organized. Childs v. Firemen's Ins. Co., 66 Minn. 393, 397, 69 N. W. 141, 142, 35 L. R. A. 99.

BOARD OF HEALTH.

The board of health is an instrumentality or agency of the city, and the city has the right to make general rules to be carried out by the board of health as its agent. As the board is but an agency of the city, its acts are in effect the acts of the city itself. Gaines v. Waters, 44 S. W. 353, 64 Ark. 609.

BOARD OF TAX REVIEW.

Boards to review taxation, while they act judicially, are not courts, but a part of the machinery of taxation, wholly within the power of the Legislature to create and regulate. State v. Wharton, 94 N. W. 359, 360, 117 Wis. 558.

BOARDER.

A boarder, who is defined by Burrill "as one who has food and lodging in another's house or family for a stipulated price," is not an inhabitant of a boarding house within Pen. Code, art. 739, providing that an entry into a house to commit theft, unless made by actual breaking, is not burglary when done by an inhabitant of the house. Ullman v. State, 1 Tex. App. 220, 222, 28 Am. Rep. 405 (quoting 1 Bur. Law Dict. p. 211).

Guest distinguished.

A "guest," as distinguished from a "boarder," is bound for no stipulated time. He stops at the inn for as long a time as he pleases, paying, while he remains, the customary charge. Stewart v. McCready (N. Y.) 24 How. Prac. 62.

If an inhabitant of a place makes a special contract with an innkeeper to board at his inn, he is a "boarder," and not a "guest," and the test whether one is a boarder or a guest depends on whether he is a traveler and a wayfarer, and is received as such by the innkeeper in his inn. If he was, he at once becomes the innkeeper's guest, and the relation subsists so long as he sojourns there as a traveler. Norcross v. Norcross, 53 Me. 163, 169.

Where a person goes to an inn as a wayfarer man and a traveler, and defendants receive him as such a traveler as a guest at their inn, the relation of innkeeper and guest was instantly established between them, and the length of time that he stayed at the inn makes no difference as to his relationship, whether he stays a week or a month, or longer, so that he retains his character as a traveler. A guest for a single night might make a special contract as to the price to be paid for his lodging, and, whether it was more or less than the usual price, it would not affect his character as a guest. If an inhabitant of a place makes a special contract with an innkeeper there for board at his inn, he is a boarder, and not a traveler or guest in the sense of the law, so as to render the innkeeper liable for his goods stolen. Berkshire Woolen Co. v. Procter, 61 Mass. (7 Cush.) 417, 423.

Where an army officer, having no permanent home, but living where duty called him, occupied rooms in defendant's hotel under an agreement to occupy them until the following spring, providing everything was satisfactory and he was not ordered sooner away on military duty, and the officer and his family took their meals at the hotel restaurant, paying for each meal the same as other guests, they were guests, and not boarders, so as to render the innkeeper liable for loss of the property of the officer. Hancock v. Rand, 94 N. Y. 1, 8, 46 Am. Rep. 112.

Mere fixing of the price to be paid does not make the person a boarder, rather than a guest, so as to render the house a boarding house rather than an inn. In re Brewster, 80 N. Y. Supp. 666, 670, 39 Misc. Rep. 689 (citing Hancock v. Rand, 94 N. Y. 1, 10, 46 Am. Rep. 112).

Where a man and his family lived in an interior county of the state, and because of the dangers of war he took his family, together with their wardrobe and silverware, and most of their family paraphernalia, and by special contract lived at a leading hotel in a suite with three rooms, over which they seemed to exercise general, if not exclusive, control, they were boarders, and not ordinary transients, so as to render the innkeeper liable on destruction of their goods by fire. Vance v. Throckmorton, 68 Ky. (5 Bush) 41, 44, 96 Am. Dec. 327.

Where a person makes a flying visit to his family at the hotel where they are boarding, and a mere temporary stay, unless something appears affirmatively to the contrary, his status as a traveler, once shown to exist, is presumed to have continued. Neither the agreement by which he was to pay special rates for himself and family, lower than those ordinarily charged for transient guests, nor the fact that he remained in the inn for a month, nor any other fact which appeared in the case, furnished any evidence that his character was changed from that of a traveler to that of a boarder, so as to relieve the innkeeper from liability for property lost. Lusk v. Belote, 22 Minn. 468, 471.

A traveler entering an inn as a guest does not cease to be a guest by proposing to remain a certain given number of days or ascertaining the price that will be charged for his entertainment, or by paying in advance for a part or the whole of his entertainment, or paying for what he has occasion for as his wants are supplied. Pinkerton v. Woodward, 33 Cal. 557, 597, 91 Am. Dec. 657; Hall v. Pike, 100 Mass. 495, 496; Metzger v. Schnabel, 52 N. Y. Supp. 105, 106, 23 Misc. Rep. 698; Ambler v. Skinner, 30 N. Y. Super. Ct. (7 Rob.) 561, 563; Ross v. Mellin, 32 N. W. 172, 173, 36 Minn. 421.

A person coming under a special contract, who boards and sojourns at an inn, is not, in the sense of the law, a "guest," but is deemed a "boarder." State v. Johnson, 4 Wash. 593, 594, 30 Pac. 672; Johnson v. Reynolds, 3 Kan. 257, 261; Hursh v. Byers, 29 Mo. 469, 470; Kisten v. Hildebrand, 48 Ky. (9 B. Mon.) 72, 74, 48 Am. Dec. 416.

That a person enters a hotel under an agreement to board by the week deprives him of the character of a guest, and transforms him into a boarder, is not true as a matter of law. Jalie v. Cardinal, 35 Wis. 118, 128.

It is sometimes difficult to draw the line between "guests" and "boarders." They frequently run into each other, like light and shadow. So, the line between a common carrier and a bailee to carry is sometimes scarcely perceptible, but the law makes the distinction, and it is the province of the judge to draw the line. A transient customer at an inn, though he be not a traveler or stranger, is considered as a "guest"; a lodger, who sojourns at an inn, and takes a room for a specified time, and pays for his lodging on a special agreement, as by the month or week, is a "boarder." Neal v. Wilcox, 49 N. C. 146, 148, 67 Am. Dec. 266.

The distinction between a "boarder" and a "guest" at a hotel, which is difficult to draw, and which is variously stated, is based mainly on the fact that boarders contract for a definite stay at a specific price. In Lawrence v. Howard, 1 Utah, 142, the court said: "In this country, hotel keepers act in a double capacity, being between innkeepers and boarding house keepers. As innkeepers they entertain travelers and transient persons, those who come without bargain as to time or price, and go away at their pleasure, paying for only actual entertainment received. As boarding house keepers they entertain resident and regular boarders for definite lengths of time, and at specified prices previously agreed upon." In Shoecraft v. Bailey, 25 Iowa, 553, the distinction between a guest and boarder seems to be this: The guest comes without any bargain for time, and remains without one, and may go whenever he pleases, paying only for actual entertainment received; and it is not enough to make one a boarder, and not a guest, that he stayed for a long time in the inn in this way. One who engaged rooms and board at a hotel for several weeks at a reduced price is a boarder, and not a guest. Meacham v. Galloway, 52 S. W. 859, 861, 102 Tenn. 415, 46 L. R. A. 319, 73 Am. St. Rep. 886.

Though the house be an inn, and the keeper an innkeeper, it does not follow that he is under the same liability to all persons who may be staying at the inn with their goods. The length of time that a man stays at an inn does not make the difference, though he stay a week or a month or more, so always, though not strictly transient, he retains his character as a traveler. Kisten v. Hildebrand, 48 Ky. (9 B. Mon.) 72, 74, 48 Am. Dec. 416.

BOARDING HOUSE.

A boarding house is a place where the guest is under an express contract for food and lodging at a certain rate for a certain period of time. Willard v. Reinhardt (N. Y.) 2 E. D. Smith, 148, 149.

A boarding house is a house where the keeping of boarders generally is carried on, and which is held out by the owner or keeper as a place where boarders are kept. A private housekeeper who entertains a boarder for hire, in a single instance, is not a boarding house keeper. A "boarding house" is not, in common parlance or in legal meaning, every private house where one or more boarders are kept occasionally only and on special considerations; it is a quasi public house where boarders are generally and habitually kept, and which is held out and known as a place of entertainment of that kind. Cady v. McDowell (N. Y.) 1 Lans. 484, 486.

A boarding house is for the accommodation only of those who are accepted as guests by the proprietor, and is as much a private house as if there were no boarders. A house is private though the head of the family boards his son, and, if taking a relative to board does not change the character of a private house, is it affected by receiving a stranger as a lodger? Commonwealth v. Cuncannon (Pa.) 3 Brewst. 344, 347.

As dwelling house.

See "Dwelling—Dwelling House."

Inn and hotel distinguished.

See "Inn"; "Hotel."

As public house.

See "Public House."

May contain bar and billiard rooms.

"Boarding house," as used in representations as to the occupancy of a house in an application for insurance, stating that it was occupied as a "boarding house," meant a house kept principally for the residence of permanent boarders; and the fact that it had a bar and billiard room, while rendering the description incomplete, did not render it false. Martin v. City Ins. Co., 44 N. J. Law, 485, 492.

BOARDING HOUSE KEEPER.

As innkeeper, see "Innkeepers."

Where a person lives at a hotel as a regular boarder by the month, at a fixed price, he is in no sense a guest, so as to hold the proprietors liable as innkeepers, but they are liable only as boarding house keepers. Lawrence v. Howard, 1 Utah, 142, 143.

"Boarding house keeper," as used in Sess. Laws 1860, 771, giving the keeper of a boarding house a lien on the property of a boarder to the extent of the board due, means "one who furnishes accommodations for a definite period, as by the week or month, at a rate of compensation agreed on." Stewart v. McCready (N. Y.) 24 How. Prac. 62.

As used in Act June 27, 1859, c. 2230, providing that all "boarding house keepers" shall have a lien on all the baggage and effects of their guests and boarders, includes innkeepers who, in addition to their business as innkeepers strictly, also take boarders. Cross v. Wilkins, 43 N. H. 332, 336.

BOARDING HOUSE PURPOSES.

Where the occupants of a building fitted up one side of a room with several stalls where oysters, cooked and raw, pies, cheese, etc., were served to persons who might call for the same, mostly to teamsters and others who were stopping in the village for a short time, the building is used for "hotel and boarding house purposes," within the restriction of a deed prohibiting the use for such purposes. Stevens v. Pillsbury, 57 Vt. 205, 210, 52 Am. Rep. 121.

BOAT.

See "Canal Boat"; "Ferryboat"; "Ship"; "Vessel."

Barge.

A barge is a boat or vessel, and hence is within the letter of a law relating to "boats and vessels." The Resort v. Brooke, 10 Mo. 531, 534.

That species of watercraft known on the western rivers of Pennsylvania as "barges" are neither ships, boats, nor vessels, within an act giving a lien for work furnished in their construction or repair. Appeal of Nease (Pa.) 3 Grant, Cas. 110, 113.

As completed vessel.

A "boat," within the marine lien law, is one that is complete and capable of being used to carry freight or passengers. The hull of a boat, without other parts necessary to its use, is not a "boat" to which a lien can attach. Northup v. The Pilot, 6 Or. 297, 299.

A small unfinished boat still in the hands of the builder, and unfit for use, is not a "vessel" within the statute punishing the burning of the same. Commonwealth v. Francis (Mass.) Thacher, Cr. Cas. 240, 242.

As a house.

See "House."

Steamboat.

The term "boats, vessels and other craft," in St. 7 & 8 Geo. IV, c. 75, § 57, authorizing by-laws for the government of "boats, vessels and other craft" to be rowed or worked, includes steamboats. Tisdell v. Combe, 7 Adol. & El. 788.

Tug.

"Boats used for the transportation of freight and passengers," within the meaning of a statute authorizing a canal company to charge tolls upon all boats, vessels, steamboats, and other craft used for the transportation of freight or passengers, does not include tugs engaged in towing freight or passenger vessels through the canal, or passing through the canal on their return trip. Sturgeon Bay & L. M. Ship Canal & Harbor Co. v. Leatham, 45 N. E. 422, 423, 164 Ill. 239.

Vessel distinguished.

The term "boat" is constantly used to designate small watercraft without a deck. In common parlance and maritime usage, there is a distinction between "vessels" and "boats," the term "vessel" being never, or at least very rarely, used to designate any watercraft without a deck. In Mortimer's Commercial Dictionary a "boat" is defined to be a "small open vessel, commonly wrought by oars." The general sense in which the term "vessel" is used in our laws is in contradistinction to an open boat, and excludes the latter, and such is its use in Act May 15, 1820, c. 122, 3 Stat. 602, prohibiting commercial intercourse from the British colonies. United States v. Open Boat (U. S.) 27 Fed. Cas. 346, 352.

Wharf boat or floating wharf.

The term "boats and other vessels," in a statute giving a lien upon boats and other vessels for construction, repairs, and supplies, applies exclusively to vessels intended for navigation, and does not include a floating wharf constructed for receiving, storing, and forwarding merchandise. Olmsted v. McNall (Ind.) 7 Blackf. 387, 388.

Where the term "boat" is used, we are likely to catch the idea of locomotion, of passing or transportation from one point to another, without hesitating to inquire whether that term is ever applied to other structures which have no power of locomotion, no propelling force by which they can move from point to point. The wharfboat is not a "boat." It has no mobility, no apparatus to change place, or power to retain position other than land fastenings. It is a building, a floating business house, or, rather, a business house upon the surface of water and sustained by its cables. Galbreath v. Davidson, 25 Ark. 490, 494, 99 Am. Dec. 232.

BOAT BUILDING.

Boat building is not the purpose of the construction of dry docks, which are rather for the purpose of repairing boats, and therefore an exemption from taxation of capital or property used in boat building is not an exemption of a dry dock. The court cannot extend the article which exempts property used in boat building to mean to exempt articles used in boat repairing. Robertson v. City of New Orleans, 12 South. 753, 754, 45 La. Ann. 617, 20 L. R. A. 691.

BOATABLE.

Const. c. 2, § 40, providing that the inhabitants of the state shall have liberty in seasonable times to fish in all "boatable" and other waters not private property, under proper regulations, refers to waters that are of common passage as highways. The word "boatable" is an apt one to express the common-law status of nonnavigable waters, public in use, though private in ownership; that is, common highways. It is unwarrantable to say that "boatable" as used was intended to embrace all waters boatable in fact, though private in use as well as in ownership, for the common law, with reference to which the framers are presumed to have acted, does not give such waters the status of boatability, but classes them by themselves as private, not only in propriety or ownership, but in use as little streams or rivers that are not of common passage for the king's subjects. New England Trout & Salmon Club v. Mather, 35 Atl. 323, 325, 68 Vt. 338, 33 L. R. A. 569.

BOC.

"Boc" is a Saxon word, signifying a beech tree. Scoville v. Toland (U. S.) 21 Fed. Cas. 863, 864.

BOCK BEER.

It is judicially known as a matter of common knowledge that bock beer, or common beer, is a malt liquor. Pedigo v. Commonwealth (Ky.) 70 S. W. 659, 660.

BODILY.

The word "bodily" means pertaining to or concerning the body; of or belonging to the body, or the physical constitution; not mental, but corporeal. Terre Haute Electric Ry. Co. v. Lauer, 52 N. E. 703, 706, 21 Ind. App. 466.

BODILY HARM.

See "Great Bodily Harm."

"Bodily harm" is any touching of the person of another against his will with physical force, in an intentional, hostile, and aggressive manner, or a projecting of such force against his person. People v. Moore, 3 N. Y. Supp. 159, 160, 50 Hun, 356.

BODILY HEIRS.

See "Heirs of the Body."

The expression "bodily heirs" is equivalent to "heirs of the body." Stratton v. McKinnie (Tenn.) 62 S. W. 636, 640; Craig v. Ambrose, 4 S. E. 1, 2, 80 Ga. 134.

In construing a devise to a devisee and bodily heirs, the words "bodily heirs" have no other or different meaning than the words "heirs of his body." Turner v. Hause, 65 N. E. 445, 447, 199 Ill. 464 (citing Dinwiddie v. Self, 145 Ill. 290, 33 N. E. 892; Kyner v. Boll, 182 Ill. 171, 54 N. E. 925).

In Kyner v. Boll, 182 Ill. 171, 54 N. E. 925, it was held that a conveyance to a grantee and her "bodily heirs" creates an estate in fee tail general at common law, but, since the abolition of estates tail, passes, under section 6 of the conveyance act, an estate for the grantee's natural life only, with a remainder in fee simple absolute to the person to whom the estate tail would, on the death of the grantee, first pass at common law. At common law a devise to a devisee and the heirs of his body created an estate tail general, leaving in the heirs at law of the deviser the reversion in case of an entire failure of issue. In construing provisions of this kind in a will, the words "bodily heirs" have no other or different meaning than the words "heirs of the body." Turner v. Hause, 65 N. E. 445, 447, 199 Ill. 464.

"Bodily heirs," as used in a will giving a portion of an estate to testator's daughter and her bodily heirs, should be construed in their popular signification as synonymous with the word "children" or "descendants," and not in their technical sense. Righter v. Forrester, 64 Ky. (1 Bush) 278, 279; Mitchell v. Simpson, 10 S. W. 372, 373, 88 Ky. 125.

BODILY INFIRMITY.

As used in Code Cr. Proc. art. 772, providing that depositions of witnesses may be read when by reason of bodily infirmity such witness cannot attend, "bodily infirmity" means such an illness or infirmity that no reasonable hope remains that the witness will be able to appear in court on any future occasion. Collins v. State, 5 S. W. 848, 850, 24 Tex. App. 141.

An "infirmity of the body," as the term implies, is something that materially impairs the bodily powers, and a statement in an application for an insurance policy that the applicant had never had any bodily infirmity is not disproved by the fact that during the Civil War he had received a gunshot wound. Black v. Travellers' Ins. Co. (U. S.) 121 Fed. 732, 733, 58 C. C. A. 14, 61 L. R. A. 500.

Insanity.

Under a policy of insurance providing that the insurance shall not extend to death or disability which may have been caused wholly or in part by bodily infirmities or disease the words "bodily infirmities or disease" do not include insanity, though insanity or unsoundness of mind often, if not always, is accompanied by or results from disease of the body, yet "mental" are distinguished from "bodily" diseases. In the phrase "bodily infirmities or disease" the word "bodily" grammatically applies to "disease" as well as to "infirmities," and it cannot but be so applied without disregarding the fundamental rule of interpretation that policies of insurance are to be construed most strongly against the insurers who framed them. The prefix of "bodily" hardly affects the meaning of "infirmities." It is difficult to conjecture any purpose it answers in this proviso other than to exclude mental disease from enumeration of the causes of death or disability to which the insurance does not extend. Accident Ins. Co. v. Crandal, 7 Sup. Ct. 685, 688, 120 U. S. 527, 30 L. Ed. 740.

The term "bodily infirmity," with reference to introduction of statement of witness in evidence, is broad enough to cover a disease of the brain or of any other part of the body, and hence includes insanity. Stewart v. State (Tex.) 26 S. W. 203.

Temporary infirmity.

An anæmic murmur indicating no structural defect of the heart, but arising simply from a temporary debility or weakened condition of the body, is not within the meaning of the term "bodily or mental infirmity" in an application for accident insurance, in which the applicant states his freedom from such infirmities. Manufacturers' Acc. Indemnity Co. v. Dorgan (U. S.) 58 Fed. 945, 951, 7 C. C. A. 581, 22 L. R. A. 620.

In a broad generic sense, any temporary trouble by reason of which a man loses consciousness is a "disease." It is a condition of the body not normal, and produced by the imperfect working of some function; but as the imperfect working is not permanent, and the body returns at once or in a short period of time to its normal condition, it does not rise to the dignity of a "disease." A fainting spell produced by indigestion or lack of proper food for a number of hours, or from any other cause which would not indicate any disease in the body, but would show a mere temporary disturbance or enfeeblement, would not come within the meaning of the words "disease and bodily infirmity," as used in an insurance policy providing that the risk shall not extend to death caused by disease and bodily infirmity. Manufacturers' Acc. Indemnity Co. v. Dorgan (U. S.) 58 Fed. 945, 955, 7 C. C. A. 581, 22 L. R. A. 620.

The words "disease or bodily infirmity," as used in a provision in an accident policy exempting insured from liability for injuries caused thereby, mean practically the same thing, and only include an ailment or disorder of a somewhat established or settled character, and not merely a temporary disorder arising from sudden and unexpected derangement of the system, though it produces unconsciousness. Meyer v. Fidelity & Casualty Co., 65 N. W. 328, 96 Iowa, 378, 59 Am. St. Rep. 374.

BODILY INJURY.

See "Great Bodily Injury"; "Serious Bodily Harm or Injury."

"Bodily injuries" does not necessarily mean injuries to the trunk or main part of the human form, as distinguished from the limbs or head, so that, under an allegation of "bodily injuries," evidence of injury to the eyesight may be introduced. Quirk v. Siegel-Cooper Co., 60 N. Y. Supp. 228, 230, 43 App. Div. 464.

A provision in an accident policy that the insurance shall not extend to any "bodily injury of which there shall be no external and visible sign upon the body of insured" does not apply to fatal injuries, but only to those not resulting in death. It would be utterly unjust if this condition applied in cases of death, as it would preclude recovery in all instances where death occurs by drowning, freezing, poisoning, suffocation, concussion—means of death leaving no outward mark—and also where insured has been killed and his body is missing. McGlinchey v. Fidelity & Casualty Co., 14 Atl. 13, 16, 80 Me. 251, 6 Am. St. Rep. 190.

BODY.

See "Deliberative Body"; "Public Body."

In an indictment for feloniously removing a "body" from the grave for the purpose of dissection or sale, the word "body" will be construed to mean a human body, without further description. People v. Graves (N. Y.) 5 Parker, Cr. R. 134, 141.

Rev. St. § 3764, prescribing a penalty against persons, etc., having unlawful possession of the body of any deceased person, does not relate or apply to the remains of persons long buried and decomposed. Carter v. City of Zanesville, 52 N. E. 126, 127, 59 Ohio St. 170.

Of corporation.

The term "body," as used with reference to a corporation, means the object, corporate or politic; not the aggregate amount of property owned by the corporation, but the collective number of individual proprietors who are incorporated. Taylor v. Griswold, 14 N. J. Law (2 J. S. Green) 222, 239, 27 Am. Dec. 33.

Of instrument.

"Body," as used in Code 1882, § 3392, requiring that a copy of "what appears upon the face and in the body of the policy" should be attached to the complaint, does not mean anything less than if applied to contracts other than insurance policies, and covers all that precedes the maker's signature. Southern Mut. Ins. Co. v. Turnley, 27 S. E. 975, 976, 100 Ga. 296.

Of person.

See "Dead Body."

"Body," as used in an indictment for murder stating "the part of the body on which the mortal wound was inflicted," means the trunk of the human frame, as distinguished from the head and limbs. It is that portion which, excluding the arms, lies between the upper part of the thighs or hips and the neck. Walker v. State, 16 South. 80, 82, 34 Fla. 167, 43 Am. St. Rep. 186.

Where the indictment for murder alleged that the mortal wound was inflicted "on the body" of deceased, such phrase seems to mean the trunk, in contradistinction from the head or limbs. Sanchez v. People, 22 N. Y. 147, 149.

Where an indictment charges that a wound was inflicted on the body, the word "body" clearly means "that part of the human frame to which the head and arms are attached." State v. Edmundson, 64 Mo. 398, 402.

BODY CORPORATE.

See "Corporate Body."

Any body corporate, see "Any."

BODY OF COUNTY.

Such parts of rivers, arms, and creeks of the sea are deemed to be within the bodies of counties where persons can see from one side to the other. Lord Hale uses more guarded language, and says that the arm or branch of the sea which lies within the fauces terræ, where a man may reasonably discern between shore and shore, is, or at least may be, within the "body of a county." Hawkins (2 P. C. c. 9, § 14) has expressed the rule in its true sense, and confines it to such parts of the sea where a man standing on the one side may see what is done on the other. United States v. Grush (U. S.) 26 Fed. Cas. 48, 51.

Vessels are lying "within the body of the county," within St. 1804, c. 131, when lying within the water which flows within the county, and not upon the high seas. Commonwealth v. Francis (Mass.) 1 Thacher, Cr. Cas. 240, 242.

As used in Revision, § 2738, providing that where the persons summoned to serve as grand or petit jurors failed to appear, or where the court decides that they have been illegally elected or drawn, the court may set aside the precept under which they were summoned and cause a precept to be issued commanding the sheriff to summon a sufficient number of persons from the "body of the county" to serve as jurors at the term of court then being holden, means from the county at large, from the people of the county at large competent to act as jurors, and it is not necessary that jurors should be summoned from every township in the county in order to be summoned from the body of the county. State v. Arthur, 39 Iowa, 631, 632.

In order to constitute a jury of the county or from the body of the county, it is not necessary that the jury or the list from which it is drawn shall be selected from all parts of the county. State v. Bolln, 70 Pac. 1, 5, 10 Wyo. 439.

Within the rule that a common-law jury must be drawn from the body of the county, the term "body of the county" is a generic term applied to the representation of the citizens of the vicinage embodied in the list of qualified jurors selected by officers appointed by law. It does not require an absolutely perfect representation of the entire body. Whether that representation, on a primary examination by the same or other officers, in a less extensive list, the inherent character of the selections is the same. They are still representative of the body of the county. People v. Dunn, 52 N. Y. Supp. 968, 970, 31 App. Div. 139.

BODY OF ESTATE.

In Code, § 1835, providing that no contract between a husband and wife shall be valid to impair or change the body or capital of the personal estate of the wife for a longer time than three years next ensuing unless it shall be in writing, "body" includes a vested interest from which no present income is derived, though it has a present value, dependent upon facts which need not be enumerated. The "body" of one's personal estate manifestly does not include the income derived from it, but does include every such vested interest as a policy of insurance. Sydnor v. Boyd, 26 S. E. 92, 93, 119 N. C. 481, 37 L. R. A. 734.

The word "body," in a will authorizing the trustees to apply to the use of testator's sister during her natural life "the whole or any portion of the body or capital" of the property held in trust for her benefit, authorizes the trustees to dispose of the realty as well as the personalty, where both were blended in the same residuary provision. Ames v. Ames, 22 Atl. 1117, 1118, 15 R. I. 12.

Within the provision of a will whereby testator directed the division of his residuary estate into six parts, and the disposition to be made by his executor of each part, and of the codicil in which he revoked the disposition thus made as to two parts, and gave them to two trustees to invest and apply so much of the income, and in such sums, as might seem proper to the trustees, to certain specified persons or into the "body of my estate," the term "body of my estate" refers to the general estate represented by the executor, as the decedent's legal representatives, as distinguished from the trust created by the codicil, the trust not being the general body of the estate, but a particular fund carved out of it. Meldon v. Devlin, 53 N. Y. Supp. 172, 176, 31 App. Div. 146.

BODY POLITIC OR CORPORATE.

A "body politic," says Lord Coke, is a body to take in succession, formed as to its capacity by policy, and is therefore called by Littleton (sections 4, 13) a "body politic." It is called a "corporation" or "body corporate" because the persons are made into a body politic, and are of capacity to take, grant, etc., by a particular name. Coyle v. McIntire (Del.) 30 Atl. 728, 730, 7 Houst. 44, 40 Am. St. Rep. 109.

"A body politic, as aptly defined in the preamble of the Constitution of Massachusetts, is 'a social compact by which the whole people covenants with each citizen, and each citizen with the whole people, that all shall be governed by certain laws for the common good.'" Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 113, 124, 24 L. Ed. 77.

"The body politic," says the preamble of the Constitution of Massachusetts, "is formed by a voluntary association of individuals. It is a social compact by which the whole people covenants with each citizen, and each citizen covenants with the whole people, that all shall be governed by certain laws for the common good." It is the duty of the people, therefore, in framing a Constitution of government, to provide for an impartial interpretation and a faithful execution of them, that every man at all times may find his security in them. Williams v. Village of Port Chester, 76 N. Y. Supp. 631, 634, 72 App. Div. 505.

Bodies politic and corporate have "been known to exist as far back at least as the time of Cicero, and Galus traces them even to the laws of Solon of Athens, who lived some 500 years before. Pothier's Pand. of Just. bk. 3, p. 109 (Paris Ed. 1823). These associated bodies or communities of individuals with certain rights and privileges belonging to them by law in their aggregative capacity were styled by the Romans 'collegium,' and sometimes 'universitas,' as 'collegia tibicinum,' 'collegia aurificum,' 'collegia architectorum,' or society, corporation, or community of flute players, goldsmiths, architects, etc. Id. bk. 20, p. 110. The term as used by one of the Roman consuls to describe the nature of such a corporation or associated body of individuals under the laws of the republic is perhaps as appropriate as any general language which can be used to describe a corporation aggregate at the present day, without referring to the specific object for which any particular corporation is organized. I have thus translated from the Latin Digest: 'But those who are permitted to form themselves into a body under the name of a "corporation," "society," or other community, have within their peculiar jurisdiction, as in the similar case of the republic, property in common and a common chest or treasury, and an agent or head of the corporation or society, by whom, as in the republic, whatever is necessary to be done for the benefit of the community may be transacted.' Dig. lib. 3, tit. 4a. And from time immemorial, as at the present day, this privilege of being a corporation or artificial body of individuals, with power of holding their property, rights, and immuni-ties in common, as a legally organized body, and of transmitting the same in such body by an artificial succession, different from the natural succession of the property of individuals, has been considered a franchise, which could not be lawfully assumed by any associated body without a special authority for that purpose from the government or sovereign power." Warner v. Beers (N. Y.) 23 Wend. 103, 122.

The term "body politic or corporate" as used in Revision, p. 539, § 7, relating to justices' courts, which provides that any body politic or corporate in this state may sue or be sued in any court for the trial of small cases in any action or proceeding over which said court has jurisdiction, means a domestic corporation. Wheeler & Wilson Mfg. Co. v. Carty, 21 Atl. 851, 53 N. J. Law (24 Vroom) 336.

Municipal corporation.

A "body politic or corporate," as defined by Lord Coke, "is a body to take in succession, framed as to its capacity by policy, and therefore is called by Littleton 'a body politic'; and it is called a 'corporation' or 'body corporate' because the persons are made into a body, and are of capacity to take, grant, etc., by a particular name." A public corporation is also defined to be "an investing the people of a place with the local government thereof." This latter description is the most appropriate, and is justified by the history of these institutions and the nature of the powers with which they were and are invested. The words do not include municipal corporations, but apply to private corporations only. People v. Morris (N. Y.) 13 Wend. 325, 334.

The term "body corporate," when applied to a municipal corporation, must be construed as a body constituted of all the inhabitants within the corporate limits. The inhabitants are the corporators. The officers of the corporation, including the legislative or governing body, are merely the public agents of the corporators. Mathewson v. Hawkins, 31 Atl. 430, 432, 19 R. I. 16.

A "body corporate," as used in Political Act, c. 21, § 13, includes an organized county within the territory. Spencer v. Sully County, 33 N. W. 97, 4 Dak. 474.

State.

Webster defines the words "body politic" to be the collective body of a nation or state as politically organized or as exercising political functions; also, a corporation. Rev. St. 1894, § 6678 (Rev. St. 1881, § 4953), authorizing recovery in the name of the state of money lost at gaming, is not inconsistent with Rev. St. 1894, §§ 251, 252 (Rev. St. 1881, §§ 251, 252), requiring every action to be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest, except that a person expressly authorized by statute may sue without joining the person for whose benefit the action is prosecuted; the state being a person under Rev. St. 1894, § 1309 (Rev. St. 1881, § 1285), declaring that the word "person" extends to bodies politic and corporate. Ervin v. State, 43 N. E. 249, 251, 150 Ind. 332.

United States.

For the purpose of receiving legacies and for many other purposes, the United States is to be regarded as a body politic and corporate. In United States v. Maurice (U. S.) 26 Fed. Cas. 1211, Chief Justice Marshall says, at page 1216: "The United States is a government, and consequently a body politic and corporate, capable of attaining the objects for which it was created by the means which are necessary for their attainment. This great corporation was ordained and established by the American people, and endowed by them with great powers, for important purposes." In re Merriam's Estate, 36 N. E. 505, 506, 141 N. Y. 479.

BOGUS CHECK.

The term "false or bogus checks," within the meaning of the statute making it criminal for any person to obtain or attempt to obtain from any other person or persons any money or property by means of the use of any false or bogus checks, does not include a note or order given by defendant and signed by himself. Pierce v. People, 81 Ill. 98, 101.

BOGUS PEDDLER.

"The phrase 'bogus peddler,' as applied to a person, has no fixed legal meaning, whether he is one who deals in counterfeit money, or wooden nutmegs, or tinware is uncertain. The words have not acquired by usage any certain signification to enable it to be said, as a matter of law, that they designate one engaged in a criminal occupation." Pike v. Van Wormer (N. Y.) 5 How. Prac. 171, 175.

BOHEA TEA.

"Bohea tea," as used in Act Cong. April 27, 1816, c. 107, wherein a duty is imposed on Bohea tea, means a compounded tea made in China of various kinds of the lowest priced black tea. Two Hundred Chests of Tea v. Smith, 22 U. S. (9 Wheat.) 430, 439, 6 L. Ed. 128.

BOLT.

In flour milling, until a few years prior to 1882, a "bolt" was a cylindrical, hexagonal, or prismatic hollow structure, mounted upon a revolving shaft, and consisting of a skeleton frame over which was stretched bolting cloth of the degree of fineness required for the particular work to be done. Jonathan Mills Mfg. Co. v. Whitehurst (U. S.) 56 Fed. 589, 591.

BOLTING CLOTH.

Bolting cloth is a thin silk fabric made very carefully, usually in widths of 48 inches, and designed and adapted primarily for use by millers, but it is capable of use also for decorative purposes in making ties, scarfs, banners, and art novelties. In re Van Blankensteyn (U. S.) 56 Fed. 474, 476, 5 C. C. A. 579.

BONA.

"Bona," as used in the civil law, is almost as extensive as "personal property" itself, and in many respects it has nearly as large a signification in the common law. Tisdale v. Harris, 37 Mass. (20 Pick.) 9, 13.

The word "bona," in the civil law, includes chattels, real as well as personal, and also lands. Penniman v. French, 34 Mass. (17 Pick.) 404, 405, 28 Am. Dec. 309.

BONA FIDE.

See, also, "Good Faith."

The distinction between bona fides and mala fides is that the former requires the thing to be in fact what it purports to be, and nothing can be further from the simple definition of "bona fide" than an absolute sale of property on execution, voidable by reason of some secret understanding between the parties to create a mere lien. Webster v. Denison, 25 Vt. 493, 498.

"The statute declares that a stockholder must be a bona fide stockholder to entitle him to vote. This phrase, 'bona fide,' in this connection, is used in contradistinction to 'bad faith.'" In re Argus Printing Co., 12 L. R. A. 781, 788, 26 Am. St. Rep. 639, 48 N. W. 347, 1 N. D. 434.

The term "bona fide," as used in the law with reference to bona fide purchasers, means only that the purchase shall be a real, and not a feigned, one; otherwise the knowledge would not be held immaterial, as it is in all the books. Hill v. Ahern, 135 Mass. 58, 159 (citing Ricker v. Ham, 14 Mass. 137).

"The use of the words 'bona fide' in an instruction cannot be understood as calculated to obscure the questions before the jury. These words are used so often by our legislators and by persons frequenting the judicial tribunals of the country that they may be considered as well understood, if not anglicized." Johnson v. Sullivan, 23 Mo. 474, 481.

In Knowles Loomworks v. Vacher, 57 N. J. Law (28 Vroom) 490, 31 Atl. 306, 33 L. R. A. 305, it was held that the meaning of the words "bona fide," as used in the statute providing that every unrecorded conditional sale of chattels shall be void as against subsequent purchasers and mortgagors in good faith, excluded the idea that the purchaser or mortgagor must also hold for value. Cited in Tate v. Security Trust Co., 52 Atl. 313, 315, 63 N. J. Eq. 559.

The words "bona fide," as used in Code, § 3853, providing that, when any person has bona fide purchased real estate and been in possession for four years, the same shall be discharged from the lien of any judgment, were intended to mean the same thing as the words "without actual notice of such judgment," which are the words used in the prior act. Phillips v. Dobbins, 56 Ga. 617, 623.

BONA FIDE CLAIMANT.

Judge Washington defines a "bona fide claimant" to be "one who supposes that he has a good title, and knows of no adverse claim." Morrison v. Robinson, 31 Pa. (7 Casey) 456, 459 (citing Thompson v. Gray, 14 U. S. [1 Wheat.] 79, 4 L. Ed. 40).

A bona fide pre-emption claimant is one who has settled on public land subject to pre-emption with the intention to acquire a title, and who has complied or is proceeding to comply in good faith with the requirements of the law to perfect his right thereto. The words "bona fide," as applied to a pre-emption claimant, do not change the qualifications of such claimant, nor the conditions on which, under the general law, a settlement with a view to pre-emption is permitted. Hosmer v. Wallace, 97 U. S. 575, 581, 24 L. Ed. 1130.

Act Cong. July 23, 1868, relating to public lands, and declaring that nothing therein shall be construed to interfere with the right of "bona fide pre-emption claimants," means one who, having the proper qualifications, in good faith settled on a parcel of land subject to pre-emption, with the intention to pre-empt it, and who had performed or was proceeding in good faith to perform the necessary conditions when the claim was presented. Rutledge v. Murphy, 51 Cal. 388, 3 Cent. Law J. 178, 179.

A "bona fide claimant," under Rev. St. § 2259, is one who supposes he has good title, and knows of no adverse claim; and the fact that strict examination of the records might show his title to be void does not prevent him from being an innocent claimant, so as to preclude his recovery for improvements made on the property. Hill v. Tissier, 15 Mo. App. 299, 306.

BOA FIDE CREDITOR.

A "bona fide creditor," within the meaning of a statute declaring that every marriage contract and every voluntary settlement made by the husband on the wife, whether in execution of marriage articles or not, must be recorded in the office of the clerk of the superior court of the county of the residence of the husband within three months after the execution thereof, and that, on failure to comply with such provisions, such contract or settlement shall not be of any force or effect against a purchaser or a creditor or surety who, bona fide, and without notice, may become such before the actual recording of the same, is a creditor who gives credit to the husband on the faith of the property contained in the marriage settlement. Brown v. Spivey, 53 Ga. 155, 159.

The term "good faith," as applied to the purchaser, ex vi termini, means one who purchases without notice and for value. This term has no natural application to a creditor who is of necessity such for value; and, without value, either express or implied, he is not a creditor. The term "creditor," as used in a statute making certain chattel mortgages void against creditors of the mortgagor, and subsequent purchasers and incumbrancers of the property in good faith, will not be held to be modified by the term "good faith." Cardenas v. Miller, 39 Pac. 783, 785, 108 Cal. 250, 49 Am. St. Rep. 84.

Of corporation.

Code 1876, § 2043, provides that when, by the charter, articles of association, or by-laws and regulations of an incorporated company, a transfer of the stock is required to be made upon the book or books of such company, no transfer of stock shall be valid, as against bona fide creditors or subsequent purchasers without notice, except from the time that such transfer shall have been registered or made upon the book or books of such company. Held, that the words "bona fide creditors" meant judgment creditors having a lien. Jones v. Lathan, 70 Ala. 164, 166.

Code, § 2043, providing that no transfer of corporate stock on the books of the corporation shall be valid as against bona fide creditors and subsequent purchasers without notice, includes attaching creditors who afterward perfect their liens. Berney Nat. Bank v. Pinckard, 6 South. 364, 365, 87 Ala. 577.

BOA FIDE ENTRYMAN.

A person cannot be deemed to be a bona fide entryman, under the homestead law, if at the time he attempts to make an entry in the land office when another person is in the actual, open, and known possession of the land. In other words, under such circumstances the entryman is charged with notice of the rights and equities of the actual occupant. Manley v. Tow (U. S.) 110 Fed. 241, 254

BOA FIDE HOLDER.

In the language of the law of merchants, "a bona fide holder for value" is a phrase of well-ascertained meaning. He is such a one as in good faith, in the usual course of business, without notice or knowledge of any defect in the title or the consideration of a note, acquires it for value paid. Matthews v. Poythress, 4 Ga. 287, 300. See, also, Lawrence v. Clark, 36 N. Y. 127, 128.

A bona fide holder for value of commercial paper is one who takes it before maturity, for a valuable consideration, in the usual course of business, without knowledge of facts which impeach its validity as between the antecedent parties, and without knowledge of facts or circumstances that would lead a careful and prudent man to suspect that the paper was invalid as between antecedent parties. Limerick Nat. Bank v. Adams, 40 Atl. 166, 168, 70 Vt. 132.

A bona fide holder of negotiable paper is one who before maturity has acquired the title in good faith, for a valuable consideration, from one capable of transferring it, or from one in possession of the paper with an apparent right to transfer it, and without any evidence of any defect in his right to transfer. Kneeland v. Miles (Tex.) 24 S. W. 1113, 1115. One who obtains the transfer of negotiable paper before maturity and for full value, without notice of any defect in the title of the apparent owner, has all the rights of a bona fide holder by title derived from the actual owner. Central Bank of Brooklyn v. Hammett, 50 N. Y. 158, 159.

A bona fide holder of a negotiable paper is one who takes it in good faith for consideration, from one capable of transferring, without notice of the consideration or attendant facts and circumstances. Longwell v. Day, 1 Mich. N. P. 286, 290.

In order to destroy the standing of a purchaser of a note as a bona fide holder, it must be shown that he did in fact know its character, or willfully refrained from learning when opportunity offered; but knowledge may be established by circumstantial evidence, so that, where the fact of the invalidity of the note was published in papers to which purchaser was a subscriber, it is sufficient to show that he was not a bona fide holder. Haggard v. Petterson, 78 N. W. 53, 54, 107 Iowa, 417.

A purchaser of negotiable railroad bonds in good faith and for their full market value may be a bona fide holder, although some of the interest coupons attached thereto were past due and unpaid at the time of the purchase. Long Island Loan & Trust Co. v. Columbus, C. & I. C. R. Co. (U. S.) 65 Fed. 455, 457.

One who pays a note for valuable consideration, without any notice or ground to suspect any defect in the title of the person from whom it was taken, or any defense against the note. The bona fide holder of negotiable paper, who has received it for a valuable consideration, without notice or reasonable ground to suspect any defect, is entitled to full protection; but, where he received it for an antecedent debt, either as a nominal payment or as a security for payment, without giving up any security for such debt which he previously had, or paying any money or giving any new consideration, he is not a holder for a valuable consideration. The principle of protecting the bona fide holder of paper, who has paid value for it or relinquished some valuable security therefor, is derived from the doctrines of the courts of equity in other cases where a purchaser has obtained the legal title without notice of the equitable rights of a third person. Stalker v. McDonald (N. Y.) 6 Hill, 93, 96, 40 Am. Dec. 389.

Payee.

A bona fide holder of a negotiable instrument is one to whom the instrument has been transferred by the payee or by some subsequent indorsee for value and before due, and without any notice of any defect in the instrument. A payee is not a bona fide holder. Hagan v. Bigler, 49 Pac. 1011, 5 Okl. 575.

Pledgee.

A party receiving negotiable paper before due, as collateral security to a loan then made, without notice of any infirmity in the note, is a bona fide holder. First Nat. Bank v. Shue, 78 N. W. 647, 119 Mich. 560.

A person who gives his money, goods, or credit for a note at the time of receiving it, or who then on account of it sustained loss or incurred liability, is a holder in due course of commercial transactions; and, where one holds a note in such a manner, the fact that the collateral taken with it was transferred in fraud of a third person will not affect the holder's rights in relation thereto, he not knowing of the fraud. Consequently, where bank stock was given as security at the time of the renewal of a note by the execution of a new one, the holder of such note and security was a bona fide holder thereof in the due course of trade. Such a transaction is not like the receipt of collaterals upon an old note which continues to exist, and is not based on a consideration of the collaterals. In the one case the collaterals may be surrendered to the rightful owner, leaving the consideration of the debt unaffected. In the other case the collaterals cannot be taken without depriving the creditor of a part of the consideration of his contract. Cherry v. Frost, 75 Tenn. (7 Lea) 1, 6.

Purchaser from bona fide holder.

A purchaser of a negotiable instrument from a bona fide holder for value acquires a good title to it as an innocent purchaser, and is himself a bona fide holder for value, and may recover thereon, free from equities, though he may have had notice of infirmities or equities in the note when he took it. Bodley v. Emporia Nat. Bank, 16 Pac. 88, 89, 38 Kan. 59.

A bona fide holder for value of negotiable instruments includes a purchaser of such paper, though he has knowledge of equities existing between the original parties to the paper, which his vendor did not have when he became the owner, for the purchaser is not affected by such equities, but stands on the title of the prior owner, and his title is intact. Butterfield v. Town of Ontario (U. S.) 32 Fed. 891, 892.

BONA FIDE OCCUPANT.

A bona fide occupant is one who supposes he has a good title, and knows of no adverse claim. Phillips v. Stroup (Pa.) 17 Atl. 220, 221.

A bona fide occupant is one who not only honestly supposes himself to be vested with the true title, but is ignorant that the title is contested by any other person claiming a superior right to it. Gresham v. Ware, 79 Ala. 192, 199.

BONA FIDE POSSESSOR.

A bona fide possessor of real estate is one who not only supposes himself to be the true proprietor of the land, but who is ignorant that his title is contested by some other person claiming a better right to it. Green v. Biddle, 21 U. S. (8 Wheat.) 1, 79, 5 L. Ed. 547; Canal Bank v. Hudson, 4 Sup. Ct. 303, 311, 111 U. S. 66, 28 L. Ed. 354; Dorn v. Dunham, 24 Tex. 366, 379 (citing Green v. Biddle, 21 U. S. [8 Wheat.] 1, 5 L. Ed. 547; Bright v. Payd [U. S.] 4 Fed. Cas. 127; Houston v. Sneed, 15 Tex. 310; Saunders v. Wilson, 19 Tex. 194); Henderson v. Pickett's Heirs, 20 Ky. (4 T. B. Mon.) 54, 60, 16 Am. Dec. 130; Sartain v. Hamilton, 12 Tex. 219, 222, 62 Am. Dec. 524; McLaughlin v. Barnum, 31 Md. 425, 454.

Adams' Glossary defines a "bona fide possessor" as one who, being in actual possession, is excusably ignorant of the facts which show he is not entitled to possess. Possession in good faith involves not only the honest belief in the possessor's title, but the absence of all knowledge on his part of any facts or circumstances which ought to put him upon inquiry, or tend to render his possession unconscientious. Lindt v. Uihlein, 89 N. W. 214, 216, 116 Iowa, 48.

A "bona fide possessor" of land is one who not only supposes himself to be the true owner of land, but who is ignorant that his title is contested by any one claiming a better right to it. One is a bona fide possessor of land where he makes an innocent mistake in point of law; for instance, as to the construction of a demise, the due execution of a power, and the like, where, though aware of the opposing claim, he may have entered in full confidence of the validity of his title. Sartain v. Hamilton, 12 Tex. 219, 222, 62 Am. Dec. 524.

"He is a bona fide possessor who possesses as owner by virtue of an act sufficient in terms to transfer the property, the defects of which he was ignorant." Civ. Code, art. 503. Beard v. Lufriu, 15 South. 207, 209, 46 La. Ann. 875.

BONA FIDE PURCHASER.

The term "bona fide purchaser" means a purchaser in good faith, without notice and for a valuable consideration. Young v. Schofield, 34 S. W. 497, 499, 132 Mo. 650; Pickett v. Barron (N. Y.) 29 Barb. 505, 507; Merritt v. Northern R. Co. (N. Y.) 12 Barb. 605, 609; Ten Eyck v. Whitbeck, 31 N. E. 994, 996, 135 N. Y. 40, 31 Am. St. Rep. 809; Alden v. Trubee, 44 Conn. 455, 459; Webster v. Howe Mach. Co., 8 Atl. 482, 487, 54 Conn. 394; Bowman v. Griffith, 53 N. W. 140, 141, 35 Neb. 361; Gregory v. Whedon, 1 N. W. 309, 311, 8 Neb. 373; Veith v. McMurtry, 42 N. W. 6, 9, 26 Neb. 341; Buchanan v. Wise, 44 N. W. 458, 463, 28 Neb. 312; Guard v. Rowan, 3 Ill. (2 Scam.) 499, 501; Scott v. McGraw, 29 Pac. 260, 261, 3 Wash. St. 675; Cloud v. Dupree, 28 Ga. 170, 173.

"The term 'bona fide purchaser' has a well-settled meaning in the law. It does not require settlement or occupancy. Any one is a bona fide purchaser who buys in good faith and pays value." United States v. Des Moines Nav. & R. Co., 12 Sup. Ct. 308, 312, 142 U. S. 510, 35 L. Ed. 1099.

A bona fide purchaser is one who at the time of his purchase advances a new consideration, surrenders some security, or does some other act which leaves him in a worse position if his purchase should be set aside, and purchases in the honest belief that his vendor had a right to sell without notice, actual or constructive, of any adverse rights, claims, interests, or equities of others in or to the property sold. A mortgagee is a purchaser to the extent of his claim, and is entitled to protection, as a bona fide purchaser, against all secret equities and trusts of which he had no notice. A creditor who makes advancements under the security of a deed of trust, in good faith, without notice of a vendor's equitable lien for the purchase money, is entitled to the protection of a bona fide purchaser. It necessarily follows that when a creditor makes advances or extends the time of the payment of his pre-existing debt for a definite time, or surrenders a valuable security on the condition that his debtor secures him in the payment of his advances and pre-existing debt by a deed of trust, and the debtor, in the performance of the condition, executes the deed of trust, the creditor is entitled to protection as a bona fide purchaser for a valuable consideration. Fargason v. Edrington, 49 Ark. 207, 214, 4 S. W. 763. A person who, without notice that his debtor has procured goods on credit by fraud, took $4,900 worth of them in payment of a pre-existing debt of $4,100, and pays the balance of $800 in cash, is a bona fide purchaser, as against the debtor's vendor. Woolridge v. Thiele, 55 Ark. 45, 47, 17 S. W. 340.

A bona fide purchaser is one who buys property of another without notice that some third party has a right to or interest in such property, and pays a full price for the same at the time of such purchase, or before he has notice of the interest of such other in the property. Salmon v. Norris, 81 N. Y. Supp. 892, 894, 82 App. Div. 362.

A bona fide purchaser, entitled to protection against prior equities or latent infirmities in the title of his vendor, who is apparently seised, and, in the transaction with him, pretends to be seised, in fee of the legal estate, is one who, in good faith, without notice, parts with value or changes his position for the worse under the belief that he is acquiring the legal estate. Good faith and a valuable consideration are the essential elements of a bona fide purchaser a court of equity will not disturb. The two must concur. Webb v. Elyton Land Co., 18 South. 178, 180, 105 Ala. 471 (quoting and approving Thames v. Rembert's Adm'r, 63 Ala. 561).

The essential elements which constitute a bona fide purchaser are a valuable consideration, the absence of notice, and the presence of good faith. Citizens' Bank v. Shaw, 84 N. W. 779, 782, 14 S. D. 197; United States v. Winona & St. P. Ry. Co. (U. S.) 67 Fed. 948, 962, 15 C. C. A. 96; Id., 17 Sup. Ct. 368, 371, 165 U. S. 463, 41 L. Ed. 789; United States v. California & O. Land Co., 13 Sup. Ct. 458, 462, 148 U. S. 31, 37 L. Ed. 354.

A purchaser of land, who has paid a valuable consideration therefor, is a bona fide purchaser, and mere absence of knowledge at the time of the purchase is the test of his bona fide character, not absence of that which might induce inquiry. Varwig v. Cleveland, C., C. & St. L. R. Co., 44 N. E. 92, 94, 54 Ohio St. 455.

The term "bona fide," when used in speaking of bona fide purchasers of property, in the law relative to fraudulent conveyances, means only that the purchase shall be a real, and not a feigned, one. Jones v. Light, 30 Atl. 71, 73, 86 Me. 437.

By a "bona fide purchaser," as the term is used in the statute providing "that no mortgage, nor any deed, or conveyance or writing in the nature of a mortgage, shall defeat or prejudice the title or interest of any bona fide purchaser of any lands, tenements, or hereditaments, unless the same shall have been duly registered," etc., is meant a person who buys without knowledge of the prior mortgage, and who would in fact be defrauded if such prior incumbrance were to stand in opposition to his title. Dunham v. Dey (N. Y.) 15 Johns. 555, 563, 8 Am. Dec. 282.

To constitute a bona fide purchaser upon a foreclosure sale, the purchase must be made for a valuable consideration and without notice. Jordan v. Humphrey, 18 N. W. 450, 451, 31 Minn. 495.

A bona fide purchaser is one who purchases for an honest, legitimate purpose, as counterdistinguished from one who purchases for some fraudulent or improper purpose, and hence every person buying at a sheriff's or constable's sale for the purpose of satisfying an honest debt is a bona fide purchaser. Wood v. Moorhouse (N. Y.) 1 Lans. 405, 412.

Sufficiency of consideration.

A bona fide purchaser is one who has either paid or advanced money on the faith of the debtor's actual title to the property transferred. Tyler v. Abergh, 3 Atl. 904, 65 Md. 18; Wells, Fargo & Co. v. Smith, 2 Utah, 39, 52. Where a vendee, by an agreement with the vendor, indorsed the purchase price on a note he held against the vendor, he was not a bona fide purchaser. Downs v. Belden, 46 Vt. 674, 678.

A "bona fide purchaser" may be defined as one who advances a new consideration, surrenders some security, or does some other act which leaves him in a worse position if his purchase should be set aside, so that a conveyance of goods, in consideration of which the purchaser cancels the seller's unsecured notes, does not render him a purchaser for value. Hamilton-Brown Shoe Co. v. Lyons, 25 S. W. 805, 806, 6 Tex. Civ. App. 633.

"A bona fide purchaser is one who buys property of another without notice that some person has a right to or interest in such property, and pays a full and fair price for the same at the time of such purchase, or before he has notice of the claim or interest of such other in the property." Spicer v. Waters (N. Y.) 65 Barb. 227, 231.

A bona fide purchaser is one purchasing property and obtaining the legal title thereto for full consideration, without notice of prior rights or equities. The payment of the purchase price, or some portion thereof, before notice, is absolutely essential. De Mott v. Starkey (N. Y.) 3 Barb. Ch. 403, 406.

A bona fide purchaser for a valuable consideration must have purchased without notice, and with the money actually paid. Savage v. Hazard, 9 N. W. 83, 84, 11 Neb. 323; Hunsinger v. Hofer, 11 N. E. 463-465, 110 Ind. 390; Baldwin v. Richman, 9 N. J. Eq. 394, 400; Lane v. Starkey, 18 N. W. 47, 48, 15 Neb. 285; Jewett v. Palmer (N. Y.) 7 Johns. Ch. 65, 11 Am. Dec. 401.

Sufficiency of notice.

Where a purchaser has knowledge of any fact sufficient to put him on inquiry as to the existence of some right or title in conflict with what he is about to purchase, he is presumed either to have made the inquiry, and ascertained the extent of such prior right, or to have been guilty of a degree of negligence equally fatal to his claim to be considered a bona fide purchaser. Salmon v. Norris, 81 N. Y. Supp. 892, 895, 82 App. Div. 362 (citing Williamson v. Brown, 15 N. Y. 354, 362).

A person who takes a conveyance of lands after attachments have been issued thereon, and with full knowledge of the situation, the consideration for which was the securing of a debt which was then due, is not a bona fide purchaser. Leathwhite v. Bennet (N. J.) 11 Atl. 29, 30.

One who buys with notice or knowledge of the fraud of his vendor in obtaining the property is not a bona fide purchaser. To constitute good faith, there must be an absence not alone of participation in the fraud or collusion with the vendee, but also of knowledge or even notice of the fraud, or of facts and circumstances calculated to put an ordinarily prudent man on inquiry, so that he would ascertain the truth. Wafer v. Harvey County Bank, 26 Pac. 1032, 1036, 46 Kan. 597.

Where a vendee has knowledge of such facts as would lead an ordinarily prudent man, using ordinary caution, to make inquiries whereby the fraudulent intent would have been discovered, he cannot be deemed a bona fide purchaser of property. Manwaring v. O'Brien, 78 N. W. 1, 2, 75 Minn. 542.

Where a lender, as a condition of loaning money on a mortgage, required the satisfaction of a prior mortgage on the premises, and a fraudulent satisfaction piece was obtained and shown to the borrower, who then loaned the money in the belief that the prior mortgage had been paid and satisfied, the fact that the prior bond and mortgage were not produced when the satisfaction piece was delivered did not affect the lender's position as a bona fide purchaser. Bacon v. Van Schoonhoven, 87 N. Y. 446, 451.

A person may be a bona fide purchaser of land, notwithstanding he purchased with notice of the lien of a judgment. Such notice is only prima facie evidence of mala fides, and may be rebutted by showing good faith toward the judgment creditor, and is a circumstance to be considered with other evidence on the question of the bona fides of the purchase and possession. Danielly v. Colbert, 71 Ga. 220, 222.

A purchaser who purchases with notice of the claims of any one having an interest in the property adverse to the interest of the vendor is not a bona fide purchaser. Gerow v. Castello, 19 Pac. 505, 506, 11 Colo. 560, 7 Am. St. Rep. 260.

A person cannot be deemed to be a bona fide purchaser of lands from a railroad company, if at the time he makes his purchase from the railroad company another person is in actual, open, and known possession of the land. In other words, he purchases with notice of the rights and equities of the actual occupant. Manley v. Tow (U. S.) 110 Fed. 241, 254.

The words "bona fide," as used in reference to the loss of the vendor's right of stoppage in transitu by a transfer of the bill of lading to a third person who bona fide gives value for it, do not mean without notice that the goods had not been paid for, but without notice of such circumstances as rendered the bill of lading not fairly and honestly assignable. Something more than the knowledge that the original vendor sold the goods on credit—e. g., knowledge that the vendee is insolvent or did not intend to pay—is necessary to convict the second purchaser of mala fides. Shepard & Morse Lumber Co. v. Burroughs, 41 Atl. 695, 696, 62 N. J. Law, 469.

One who purchases with knowledge of an outstanding claim of title, or information sufficient to put him upon inquiry, is not a bona fide purchaser. Prickett v. Muck, 42 N. W. 256, 258, 74 Wis. 199.

To constitute a bona fide purchaser, there must be a want of notice both at the time of the purchase and at the time of the actual payment of the purchase price. Notice before payment is equivalent to notice before the contract, even though the unpaid balance is secured. Thus, where a prospective lender of money on a real estate mortgage is advised that the borrower is without title, but that a deed conveying the property to him is deposited in escrow, and he neglects to ascertain the terms of the escrow, he is not a bona fide purchaser. Balfour v. Hopkins (U. S.) 93 Fed. 564, 570, 35 O. C. A. 445.

The doctrine of bona fide purchaser is not a rule of property. It does not determine the question of title between the parties. It means that equity will refuse to interfere to aid the plaintiff in his suit, because, under the circumstances of the case, it would be unconscionable that the plaintiff should have what he seeks to obtain. It enforces no right, but simply refuses to interfere in the plaintiff's behalf. The doctrine of bona fide purchaser is not applied to protect an equity against a legal estate, but to protect the legal title against a prior equity, by uniting with such legal title an equity arising from the payment of money and securing the conveyance without notice and a clear conscience. A deed of an insane grantor is absolutely void, and therefore a bona fide purchaser from the grantee takes no title. German Savings & Loan Soc. v. De Lashmuth (U. S.) 67 Fed. 399, 400.

A bona fide purchaser is a purchaser of property without notice of any equity or claim of another relating thereto. He need not be an original purchaser from the person having notice, nor need he be a purchaser without notice himself, for, if a person who has notice, and is therefore not a bona fide purchaser, sells to a person who has no notice, and is a bona fide purchaser for a valuable consideration, the latter may protect his title, though it was affected with the equity arising from the notice in the person from whom he derived it. So, too, if a purchaser who has not notice, and is a bona fide purchaser, thereafter sells to a person who has notice, such person stands in the shoes of the bona fide purchaser, and therefore himself becomes a bona fide purchaser. Derolu v. Jennings, 4 Neb. 97, 100.

One who, having agreed to receive certain shares of stock in payment of notes held by him, learns of equities affecting such stock before he delivers up the notes, or in any way carries out the agreement, is not a bona fide purchaser of the stock. Hayden v. Charter Oak Driving Park, 63 Conn. 142, 147, 27 Atl. 232.

Assignee for creditors.

A voluntary assignee for the benefit of creditors is not a bona fide purchaser. He takes subject to all equities, and has no greater rights in the assigned estate than his assignee has. It comes into his hands charged with all the equities existing with respect to it at the time of the assignment. Bertha Zinc & Mineral Co. v. Clute, 27 N. Y. Supp. 342, 345, 7 Misc. Rep. 123.

Execution creditor.

The term "bona fide purchaser," as used in Gen. St. § 215, providing that all deeds of real estate shall be valid, as against subsequent bona fide purchasers, after being recorded, and not before, construed to include a judgment creditor purchasing the land of his debtor at an execution sale under his judgment. McMurtrie v. Riddell, 13 Pac. 181, 182, 9 Colo. 497.

An execution creditor who bids off property at a sale on his own execution, and applies the bid to the payment of his own judgment, is not regarded as a bona fide or innocent purchaser. Carnahan v. Yerkes, 87 Ind. 62, 67.

A creditor buying at his own sale, and crediting his bid on the judgment, is not a bona fide purchaser for value. This doctrine proceeds on the principle that the creditor receiving the conveyance does not divest himself of any right or place himself in any worse situation than he would have been if he had received notice of a prior title existing in the property in favor of a third party. He is treated as advancing nothing on the faith of his purchase, and as losing nothing if the apparent title of his vendor should prove worthless. McKamey v. Thorp, 61 Tex. 648, 652.

The court, in Carnahan v. Yerkes, 87 Ind. 62, 67, says that "an execution creditor who bids off property at a sale on his own execution, and applies the bid to the payment of his own judgment, is not regarded as a bona fide or innocent purchaser." The statement is incomplete, because silent as to notice. Applied to a judgment-creditor purchaser with notice of the prior equity, it is right; to one without notice, wrong. The facts in the case disclose that the judgment-creditor purchaser had notice prior to the execution sale of the senior rights of his adversary. The quotation must be limited or regarded as dictum. A judgment creditor purchasing in good faith at a proper execution sale on his own valid judgment is a bona fide or innocent purchaser for value, and takes free from secret equities. Pugh v. Highley, 53 N. E. 171, 173, 152 Ind. 252, 44 L. R. A. 392, 71 Am. St. Rep. 327.

A judgment creditor who purchased land at a sale under his own judgment, without notice, and who merely credits the net proceeds upon such judgment, is a bona fide purchaser. Foorman v. Wallace, 17 Pac. 680, 681, 75 Cal. 552 (citing Hunter v. Watson, 12 Cal. 363, 377, 73 Am. Dec. 543).

Purchaser of homestead entryman.

A purchaser from persons claiming to represent a person making a homestead entry is not a bona fide purchaser from the latter. Puget Mill Co. v. Brown (U. S.) 59 Fed. 35, 38, 7 C. C. A. 643.

Quitclaim grantee.

A purchaser who takes by quitclaim deed is affected by a prior equity, and will not be protected as a bona fide purchaser for value. Everston v. Central Bank, 6 Pac. 605, 608, 33 Kan. 352; Richards v. Snyder, 6 Pac. 186, 192, 11 Or. 501 (citing Baker v. Woodward, 6 Pac. 173, 181, 12 Or. 3); Baker v. Woodward, 6 Pac. 173, 181, 12 Or. 3; Utley v. Fee, 7 Pac. 555, 560, 33 Kan. 683; Johnson v. Williams, 14 Pac. 537, 539, 37 Kan. 179, 1 Am. St. Rep. 243.

It is the settled law of the Supreme Court of the United States that one who takes simply by a quitclaim deed is not a bona fide purchaser without notice. Oliver v. Platt, 44 U. S. (3 How.) 410, 11 L. Ed. 622; May v. Le Claire, 78 U. S. (11 Wall.) 232, 20 L. Ed. 50; Villa v. Rodriguez, 79 U. S. (12 Wall.) 338, 20 L. Ed. 406; Dickerson v. Colgrove, 100 U. S. 578, 25 L. Ed. 618. Consequently, the law of Nebraska not appearing to be otherwise, one deriving the title for mares by a deed which is designated in the granting clause as a quitclaim, and which contains a recital that the grantors will, as heirs, make no further claim to the property conveyed, is not a bona fide purchaser without notice, as against the grantee in the deed under a prior unrecorded conveyance from an ancestor during his lifetime. Hastings v. Nissen (U. S.) 31 Fed. 597, 600.

"A person who takes by a quitclaim deed is not a bona fide purchaser, and takes only the interest which his grantor has. Under the cloak of quitclaim deeds, speculators close their eyes to honest and reasonable inquiries, and traffic in apparent imperfections in titles. The usual method of conveying a good title—one in which the grantor has confidence—is by warranty deed. The usual method of conveying a doubtful title is by quitclaim deed." Peters v. Cartier, 45 N. W. 73, 74, 80 Mich. 124, 20 Am. St. Rep. 508.

It has been held that a person who held real estate by virtue of a quitclaim deed, only, from his immediate grantor, whether he is a purchaser or not, is not a bona fide purchaser in respect to outstanding and adverse equities, when shown by the records, and which are discoverable by the exercise of reasonable diligence in making proper examination and inquiry. Johnson v. Williams, 37 Kan. 179, 14 Pac. 537, 1 Am. St. Rep. 243. A quitclaim deed, duly recorded, taken by the purchaser in good faith for a valuable consideration, will prevail over a prior unrecorded deed, where the subsequent purchaser had no notice of the former deed, and could not have discovered its existence by an investigation of the public records, or by the exercise of reasonable diligence in making proper examination and inquiry. Merrill v. Hutchinson, 25 Pac. 215, 45 Kan. 59, 23 Am. St. Rep. 713.

Tax purchaser.

A purchaser of land for taxes is not a bona fide purchaser, because he is deemed to have notice of whatever defects the records in the county clerk's office, on which his deed is founded, disclose. Simpson v. Edmiston, 23 W. Va. 675, 680.

A tax purchaser clearly cannot be, in the strict technical sense, a "bona fide purchaser," as that term is understood in the law, because a bona fide purchaser is one who buys an apparently good title, without notice of anything calculated to impair or affect it, but a tax purchaser is always deemed to have some notice when the records defects. Pennock v. Douglas County, 58 N. W. 117, 121, 39 Neb. 293, 27 L. R. A. 121, 42 Am. St. Rep. 579.

"A bona fide purchaser is one who buys an apparently good title, without notice of anything calculated to impair or affect it." A tax purchaser is not a bona fide purchaser, since he is chargeable with notice of defects appearing on the record. Budge v. City of Grand Forks, 47 N. W. 390, 393, 1 N. D. 309, 10 L. R. A. 165.

Tax purchaser.

A tax purchaser is not a bona fide purchaser, in the strict and proper legal sense. The rule caveat emptor applies to him, and he takes all the risks of his purchase. Coles v. Washington County, 35 Minn. 124, 128, 27 N. W. 497, 499 (citing Cooley, Tax'n, 329-375).

Of public lands.

Within the meaning of Act June 3, 1878, c. 151, 20 Stat. 89 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1545], providing for the sale of timber lands and lands valuable chiefly for stone, and that any grant or conveyance made by any person who has availed himself of the provisions of the act, except in the hands of bona fide purchasers, shall be null and void, one who purchases land before patent is issued is not an innocent purchaser, so far as there may exist reasons why the patent should not issue. He buys subject to the risk of the consequences of the inquiry depending in the department. At most, he acquires but an equitable title, the legal title being in the government; and it is a familiar rule that the purchaser of an equitable title takes and holds it subject to all equities upon it in the hands of the vendor, and has no better standing than he. A bona fide purchaser of land is one who is the purchaser of the legal title or estate, and a purchaser of a mere equity is not embraced in the definition. Hawley v. Diller, 20 Sup. Ct. 986, 990, 178 U. S. 476, 44 L. Ed. 1157.

A. entered upon public land within the limits of an incorporated city, and filed a declaration of intention to pre-empt the same. He afterwards made proof and received the usual patent certificate. Following this, the Department of the Interior, on a rigid investigation, vacated the entry made by him, and the land was sold at public auction by the commissioner, as a disconnected tract, to other parties. Following this, a new Secretary of the Interior reversed the former decision of the office, and granted a patent to A. Subsequent to his entry upon the land, but prior to the grant of the patent, A. sold to various parties. Held, that none of these were bona fide purchasers, so as to be entitled to the protection of a court of equity, as against those who purchased at the auction sale: (1) Because the legal title, until the issue of the patent, remained in the United States, and the grantees took only an equity, and, being but an equity, it was overreached by the better equity of their adversaries; (2) because those purchasing were bound to know the law, and that the land, being within the incorporated limits of the city, was not liable to pre-emption; (3) because the defect in the title was as radical as if no entry had been made. Root v. Shields (U. S.) 20 Fed. Cas. 1160, 1167.

A pre-emptor who has his final certificate and certificate of purchase has only acquired right to a patent, provided his acts were legal and such as to warrant the issuance of a patent to him, so that one who purchases from him acquires only an equitable interest in the land, and is not, therefore, entitled to protection as a bona fide purchaser. American Mortg. Co. v. Hopper (U. S.) 64 Fed. 553, 560, 12 C. C. A. 293.

The assignee of a certificate of purchase of lieu lands from a state, issued to an applicant therefor, who purchased for value, without notice of the falseness of the affidavit of the applicant, is in no better position than the applicant, as he is a purchaser of an equitable interest in the land, the legal title being in the state, and is therefore not protected by the rule as to bona fide purchasers. Taylor v. Weston, 20 Pac. 62, 64, 77 Cal. 534.

Of railroad lands.

The expression bona fide purchaser is oftentimes used ambiguously, and is construed in various ways. We look to the context, and consider the term with reference to its use in the connection in which it is found. It may mean without fraud or deception. It may mean without notice of another's rights. It sometimes signifies honesty of purpose, as distinguished from bad faith. To be a bona fide purchaser may under some circumstances require the payment of the consideration or purchase price, but not always. As used in the fifth section of Act March 3, 1887, providing that when railroad companies have sold lands as parts of their grants coterminous with their constructed lines of road to citizens, or to persons who have declared their intention to become citizens, but for some reason these lands were excepted from the operation of the grants, and could not be conveyed to the companies, these citizens or persons, if bona fide purchasers, should have the right to buy of the government, and should thereupon be entitled to patents. The term "bona fide" is used as the opposite of "mala fide." O'Connor v. Gertgens, 89 N. W. 866, 871, 85 Minn. 481.

Of trust property.

A purchaser of real property from a trustee in good faith for a valuable consideration, and without notice, actual or constructive, of the prior equity of the cestui que trust, is a bona fide purchaser, and is entitled, in a court of equity, to its protection against such equitable rights; but a party having actual notice of such trust, or constructive notice by reason of the record of instruments creating such trust, is not entitled to the protection of a bona fide purchaser. Eversdon v. Mayhew, 3 Pac. 641, 644, 65 Cal. 163.

One who, after two years' administration of an estate, for fair value, without notice of fraud in the devisee, buys land from him, and at once reconveys it for security for his purchase notes, is a bona fide purchaser for value, protected by Code, § 1442, against creditors of the estate. Arrington v. Arrington, 19 S. E. 351, 356, 114 N. C. 151.

Of usurious contract or security.

A bona fide purchaser, within the rule of law which declares usurious contracts and securities issued thereon void, except in favor of bona fide purchasers, is a purchaser for a valuable consideration, without notice of the usurious nature of the contract or security. Jordan v. Humphrey, 18 N. W. 450, 451, 31 Minn. 495.

BONA FIDE SEARCH.

As used in the statement of the rule to the effect that, where an instrument is claimed to be lost, in order to give evidence of its contents, it must be shown that a "bona fide and diligent search" has been unsuccessfully made for it, is a term so general in its character that it is impossible to give a precise definition as to what constitutes a bona fide and diligent search. The question must be determined in a great measure by the circumstances of each individual case. Thayer v. Barney, 12 Minn. 502, 510 (Gil. 406, 420).

BONA FIDE STOCKHOLDER.

A bona fide stockholder within a statute providing that no one shall be a director of the corporation, save a bona fide stockholder, is one who holds stock in good faith, and not one to whom stock has been issued so as to put title in him colorably, with a view to qualify him to be a director, for some dishonest purpose touching the organization or control of the company. In re Election of St. Lawrence Steamboat Co., 44 N. J. Law (15 Vroom) 529, 541.

BONA FIDE SUBSCRIBER.

A "bona fide subscriber to the stock of a corporation" means one who will in fact bring to the corporation the amount of capital which the subscription denotes, and upon which its creditors and all persons dealing with the corporation can rely; and so a subscription by one as a trustee for the proposed corporation is not bona fide, within a statute forbidding the commencement of business until all the capital stock is subscribed for by bona fide subscribers. Johnston v. Allis, 41 Atl. 816, 818, 71 Conn. 207.

BONA NOTABILIA.

"Bona notabilia," as used in English probate law, means notable goods, or property worthy of notice, or of sufficient value to be accounted for. In order to come within this description, it must have amounted to at least £5. Thus, where a decedent left goods of a sufficient amount (bona notabilia) in different dioceses, administration is granted by the metropolitan, to prevent the confusion arising from the appointment of many different administrators. 2 Bl. Comm. 509; Rolle, Abr. p. 908. So, also, the rule became established that debts such as are evidenced by promissory notes, etc., are bona notabilia at the domicile of the debtor, authorizing an administration at such place. Moore v. Jordan, 13 Pac. 337, 339, 36 Kan. 271, 59 Am. Rep. 550.

BONA PARAPHERNALIA.

The phrase "bona paraphernalia," borrowed from the civil law, became the settled description of the wife's clothing and ornaments. The husband could not devise them away, and after his death the widow could hold them as against his executors or legatees, but was obliged to surrender them to his creditors where there was a deficiency of assets. Even the presents given by him to her before marriage, such as jewels, rings, etc., could not afterwards be saved from his creditors, and the paramount title of the husband was still preserved, since he could dispose of these articles absolutely in his lifetime. Whiton v. Snyder, 88 N. Y. 299, 303.

Any bond, see "Any."

A bond is merely an obligation under seal. Commonwealth v. Smith, 92 Mass (10 Allen) 448, 455, 87 Am. Dec. 672.

A "bond" may be briefly defined to be a sealed obligation to pay money. It may be either single and absolute, or upon condition and contingency. However complicated may be the condition or contingency, and however alien from pecuniary considerations may seem the inducements to its execution or the circumstances surrounding the parties, a bond will always be found to resolve itself into an obligation to pay money sooner or later—either absolutely or upon some condition or on the happening of some future event. Rawson v. Taylor (Neb.) 95 N. W. 1033, 1036 (citing Murfree, Off. Bonds).

A bond, as defined by Blackstone, is a deed whereby the obligor obligates himself, his heirs, executors, or administrators, to pay a certain sum of money on a day appointed. Williams v. State, 6 South. 831, 832, 25 Fla. 734, 6 L. R. A. 821; Rondot v. Rogers Tp. (U. S.) 99 Fed. 202, 209, 39 C. C. A. 462.

"A bond is what binds. Therefore any instrument in writing that legally binds a party to do a certain thing may be called a bond." Courand v. Vollmer, 31 Tex. 397, 401.

Bonds are obligations payable at a definite time, running through a series of years. They are payable when the time of their maturity arrives, independent of any presentation. Shelley v. St. Charles County Court (U. S.) 21 Fed. 699, 701.

The term "bond" is sometimes used as a generic term—as a written instrument by which a person has become bound or committed legally. Usually the word is taken to mean a secondary or accessory securing a primary obligation in favor of some third person. Thus, an instrument declaring, "I agree to stand security for L. to the amount of his contract," is not technically a bond. State v. Leo, 32 South. 447, 452, 108 La. 496.

The word "bond" has a definite legal signification. It is a clause, with a sum affixed as a penalty, binding the party to pay the same, conditioned, however, that payment of the penalty may be avoided by the performance by one or more of the parties of certain acts. United States v. Rundle (U. S.) 100 Fed. 400, 403, 40 C. C. A. 450 (citing In re Fitch [N. Y.] 3 Redf. Sur. 457).

A bond by specialty to pay a certain sum of money is a deed or instrument under seal, by which the maker or obligor binds himself to pay a designated sum of money to another, usually with a clause to the effect that, on the performance of a certain condition, the obligation shall be void. "A bond is said to be prima facie a penal obligation, and the sum mentioned therein is not construed as liquidated damages unless other language used in the instrument, or accompanying circumstances, shows that such was the intention of the contracting party; but, if the sum named is to be taken as penalty only, on a breach of the obligation the obligee is entitled to recover only such actual damages as he may suffer from the breach of the condition." Turck v. Marshall Silver Min. Co., 5 Pac. 838, 839, 8 Colo. 113.

A bond is a deed or obligatory instrument in writing whereby one doth bind himself to another to pay a sum of money or do some other act. It contains an obligation with a penalty and a condition, which expressly mentions what money is to be paid or other thing performed, and the limited time for the performance thereof, for which the obligation is peremptorily binding. The ceremony, as necessary to a bond or obligation, consists of writing on paper or parchment, sealing, and delivering. Boyd v. Boyd (S. C.) 2 Nott & McC. 125, 126.

The word "bond" necessarily imports that there is a written instrument. Plerson v. Townsend (N. Y.) 2 Hill, 550, 551.

A bond implies an obligor bound to do what it is agreed shall be done. Davenport v. Dodge County, 105 U. S. 237, 241, 26 L. Ed. 1018, 1020.

An instrument with a scrawl annexed to the signature is a bond, without purporting to be such on its face. Harden v. Webster, 29 Ga. 427, 429.

An instrument in writing under seal, signed by the defendants, and obliging them to pay the plaintiff a sum of money named, is a bond, within the meaning of Act April 9, 1873, § 9, as amended by Act Feb. 27, 1879, providing that a married woman may give bond as if she were a feme sole. Hurleton, in his work on Bonds, uses this language: "A bond is an instrument under seal, whereby one becomes bound unto another for the payment of a sum of money, and for the performance of any other act or thing." No certain form is necessary. Any form of words, in writing under seal, acknowledging a debt and naming an obligee, is as obligatory as the most formal act. Warden, Bushnell & Glessner Co. v. Stewart (Del.) 36 Atl. 88, 2 Marv. 275.

The term "bond," in 16 Stat. 272, and Gen. Laws, c. 44, § 2, exempting bonds from taxation, includes the premium on such bonds, and therefore such premiums are not subject to taxation. "The premium is not something distinct from the bond, and cannot exist apart from the bond. It is inherent in it and goes with it. When the bond is transferred, that goes along, and as the bond approaches maturity it vanishes. The premium is part of the entire value of the bond, and when that is taxed the bond is taxed, or, what is equally condemned, the value or a part of the value of the bond is taxed. The conception of the premium upon a bond as a distinct entity for the purpose of taxation is too transcendental and metaphysical for common comprehension and judicial cognizance.

Rhode Island Hospital Trust Co. v. Armington (R. I.) 41 Atl. 570.

The term "bonds" or "stocks," whenever used in the chapter relating to the revenue, shall be held to mean and include bonds or stocks of whatsoever kind, whether issued by incorporated or unincorporated companies, towns, townships, counties, states, or other corporations, held or controlled by persons residing in this state, whether for themselves, or as guardians, trustees, or agents, on which the holder or owner thereof is receiving or is entitled to receive interest for themselves or others. Rev. St. Mo. 1899, § 9123.

Land contract.

Testator bequeathed to a legatee all bonds and mortgages for sales of real estate already made or hereafter to be made in the county of W. Memorandum on justice's docket.

Rev. St. § 3782, 3783, to be signed by sureties for costs in an action. Stark v. Small, 39 N. W. 359, 72 Wis. 215.

As negotiable instrument.

The term "bonds," as used in Austin City Charter, § 2, authorizing the raising of money by issuing bonds of the city, implies something more than a mere promise to pay; that is to say, it implies bonds having the commercial quality of negotiability. Money may be borrowed by a city on a nonnegotiable instrument, but, in order to obtain advantageous terms, and to enter the market of the world in fair competition for the use of money, it must issue a commercial paper. The power to issue bonds was granted to the city of Austin for the purpose of enabling it to raise money, and it is not to be presumed that it was intended to restrict the power to the issuing of obligations that would not be effective for the purpose, and advantageous to the city. City of Austin v. Nalle, 22 S. W. 668, 674, 85 Tex. 520.

Recognizance.

Recognizance distinguished, see "Recognizance."

The term "bond," in a statute authorizing certain corporations to become sureties on bonds, includes a recognizance, as a recognizance is a bond, in the strict sense of the word. Lovejoy v. Isbell, 40 Atl. 531, 532, 70 Conn. 557.

Act June 14, 1836 (P. L. 638), is entitled "An act relative to bonds with penalties and official bonds," and the sixth section provides that every bond and obligation which shall be given to the commonwealth by any public officer may be sued and prosecuted in the manner therein prescribed, by which one suit and one judgment only can be entered, and the interests of all persons aggrieved may be from time to time suggested on the record, and proceedings had by writs of scire facias on such judgments to ascertain the amounts which each may be entitled to recover. Held, that the words "every bond and obligation" mean only official bonds, strictly so called, and do not include a recognizance. McMicken v. Commonwealth, 58 Pa. (8 P. F. Smith) 213, 218.

Under Gen. St. 1902, § 821, providing that the authority signing a writ of error shall, before its issue, take a good and sufficient bond, with surety, that the plaintiff in error shall prosecute his suit to effect, the certificate of the giving of the security is not defective because denominating such security a "recognizance," instead of a bond; it being held that a recognizance is a bond, within the meaning of the statute. Vincent v. Mutual Reserve Fund Life Ass'n, 55 Atl. 177, 178, 75 Conn. 650.

As record.

See "Record."

As sealed instrument.

The term "bond" means an instrument under seal, and an instrument without a seal is not a bond. Cuddeback v. Parks (Iowa) 2 G. Greene, 148, 150; Inhabitants of Boothbay v. Giles, 68 Me. 160, 162; Skinner v. McCarty (Ala.) 2 Port. 19, 22; Cantey v. Duren (S. C.) Harp. 434, 435; State ex rel. West v. Thompson, 49 Mo. 188, 189. The term is so used in Rev. St. 103, § 20, providing that, if judgment shall have been rendered in favor of the plaintiff, the master, owner, agent, or consignee of the boat or vessel, or other person interested, may appeal, by giving bond. The Lake of the Woods v. Shaw (Iowa) 2 G. Greene, 91, 92. Likewise in Act May 10, 1800, requiring a receiver of public moneys to give a bond, with sufficient security, for the faithful discharge of his trust. United States v. Linn, 40 U. S. (15 Pet.) 290, 311, 10 L. Ed. 742. Such is its meaning in South Carolina executors' law of 1789, providing the order of payment of intestates' debts, and stipulating that "bonds or other obligations" shall be paid before debts due on open accounts. Rippon's Ex'rs v. Townsend's Ex'rs (S. C.) 1 Bay, 445, 447; Lane v. Morris, 10 Ga. 162, 167.

In order to constitute a "bond," legally speaking, sealing is essential. It is a deed, and the word therefore necessarily imports a sealed obligation. The meaning is the same in common parlance. People v. Wiley (N. Y.) 3 Hill, 194, 212.

The term "bond," at common law, was used to designate an instrument in writing, having a seal formed of wax or some tenacious substance that would receive and retain an impression. In the United States a scroll has been allowed to be used as a substitute for the wax seal, and hence a bond required by act of Congress to be given by receivers of public money means a bond having either a wax seal or a scroll. United States v. Stephenson's Ex'rs (U. S.) 27 Fed. Cas. 1305, 1306.

The term "bond," in its ordinary, popular signification, includes an instrument, not under seal, by which the maker binds himself to pay money or do some act specified, as well as instruments for like purposes under seal. Lane v. Inhabitants of Town of Embden, 72 Me. 354, 364.

The word "bond" imports a seal, and the word, when used in the statute authorizing the issue by a municipal corporation of written obligations negotiable in character, means specialties or writings under seal. By How. Ann. St. § 7778, it is provided that no bond, deed of conveyance, or other contract in writing shall be deemed invalid for want of a seal or scroll affixed thereto by such party, so that a township bond to which the officers neglected to affix a seal is naturally a sealed instrument, so as to make an action upon it an action of covenant. Rondot v. Rogers Tp. (U. S.) 99 Fed. 202, 209, 39 C. C. A. 462.

An instrument in writing will not be considered as sealed unless by some expression in the body of the instrument the maker shows that he intended it to be considered as a specialty. A mere scrawl at the end of a name, with the word "Seal" in it, will not make the writing a bond. Glasscock v. Glasscock, 8 Mo. 577, 578.

The word "bond," as used in the civil procedure act, does not necessarily imply sealed, but in other respects means the same kind of instruments as heretofore. Horner's Rev. St. Ind. 1901, § 1285.

The words "bond" and "indenture," when used in statutes, do not necessarily imply a seal. Code Iowa 1897, § 48, subd. 20.

The words "bond" and "indenture" do not necessarily imply a seal, but in other respects mean the same kind of instruments as heretofore. Gen. St. Kan. 1901, § 7342, subd. 20.

The word "bond" does not necessarily imply an instrument under seal, or with a penalty or forfeiture. Stone v. Bradbury, 14 Me. (2 Shep.) 185, 191.

The term "bond" is of frequent occurrence in the statutes of the republic of Texas as passed prior to the adoption of the common law, and its signification, as used therein, has been defined by the courts; holding that the term was to be interpreted and construed according to its meaning and force in the civil law, and since no such word as "bond" was known to the civil law, but its equivalent under that law was the word "obligation," and as a seal was not required to give force and validity to an obligation, it was not necessary to the validity of a bond. The word "bond," as used in the law of Texas in force previous to the introduction of the common law (January 20, 1840), had a defined meaning and construction, which excluded the idea that a seal was at all essential to the validity of such an instrument. After the adoption of the common law in Texas, it was held that a seal was still unnecessary to the validity of a bond, since the adoption of the common law could not be construed to be an amendment of the statutes already in force with respect to bonds, or to impair the obligation of contracts already made, and to hold that statutes and contracts subsequently made were affected thereby would be to make the meaning of the statute, or the binding force of the contract, dependent on the date when it was enacted or made. Foster v. Champlin, 29 Tex. 22, 28.

The word "bond" does not, ex vi termini, imply a contract under seal, but, as used in popular language, imports the substantive action expressed by the verb "to bind," and, if one is bound, he is in bonds or under bonds; and the word implies nothing more than a binding contract, in whatever form, and though, in legal phraseology, the term usually denotes a specialty, it does not necessarily imply a contract under seal. Ide v. Passumpsic & C. R. R. Co., 32 Vt. 297, 299.

The term "bond," ex vi termini, signifies an instrument under seal. But since the enactment of the Code of Civil Practice that there shall be no difference in evidence between sealed and unsealed writings, and that every writing not sealed shall have the same force and effect that it would have if sealed, the term "bond," as used in statutes, does not necessarily imply a sealed instrument. Wild Cat Branch v. Ball, 45 Ind. 213, 215.

Share of stock.

The term "bonds," as used in a will bequeathing to the testator's widow all of his government and other bonds which he might possess at the time of his decease, does not include shares of stock in a bank. Benton v. Benton, 63 N. H. 289, 295, 56 Am. Rep. 512.

Undertaking.

The term "bond," when used in any statute, shall embrace every written undertaking for the payment of money or acknowledgment of being bound for money, conditioned to be void on the performance of any duty or the occurrence of anything therein expressed and subscribed, and delivered by the party making it, to take effect as his obligation, whether it be sealed or unsealed. Code Miss. 1892, § 1501.

Undertaking on appeal.

"Bond" includes an undertaking. Rev. St. Wyo. 1899, § 2724; Laws N. Y. 1892, c. 677, § 16; Bates' Ann. St. Ohio 1904, § 23; Bates' Ann. St. Ohio 1904, § 4947; Bates' Ann. St. Ohio 1904, § 6794; Rev. St. Wyo. 1899, § 5100.

An undertaking on appeal is within the term "bonds," as used in Civ. Code 1895, § 604, and provision 3, authorizing the creation of corporations to execute or guaranty any bonds required by law to be given in any proceeding in court. King v. Pony Gold Min. Co., 62 Pac. 783, 787, 24 Mont. 470.

Warrant distinguished.

There is a vast difference between bonds and warrants. Warrants are general orders payable when funds are found, and bonds, are obligations payable at a definite time, running through a series of years. They are payable when the time of their maturity arrives, independent of any presentation. Shelley v. St. Charles County Court (U. S.) 21 Fed. 699, 701.

BOND AND MORTGAGE.

A "bond and mortgage" are distinct and separate securities, though for the same debt. As against the rights of third parties, payment in fact of either extinguishes the debt, and therefore satisfies the other. And even between the parties the two securities are so far parts of the same transaction that the satisfaction of one is presumed to be payment of the debt, and therefore to include the satisfaction of the other, and the burden of proof is on the creditor to show the contrary. Meigs v. Bunting, 141 Pa. 233, 239, 21 Atl. 588, 589, 23 Am. St. Rep. 273.

BOND FOR PAYMENT OF MONEY.

A motion founded on a delivery bond is an action founded on a bond for the payment of money, within the meaning of Act 1827, c. 72, providing that in all actions founded on bonds for the payment of money, taken from an inferior to a superior jurisdiction, the securities of the parties appealing shall be bound for the payment of the latter debt, damages, costs, etc. Banks v. Brown, 12 Tenn. (4 Yerg.) 198, 199.

BOND FOR TITLE.

As conveyance, see "Conveyance."

A bond for title is not distinguishable, in its ordinary operation and effect, from a simple agreement for the same purpose. Sayre v. Mohney, 47 Pac. 197, 198, 30 Or. 238.

A bond for title does not purport to convey the title to the obligee, but is an executory agreement to make title in the future on the performance of certain conditions. White v. Stokes, 53 S. W. 1060, 1061, 67 Ark. 184.

BOND OF RAILROAD.

The bonds of a railroad corporation are personal securities, in contradistinction to public and real securities, and can only be upheld as proper subjects for the investment of trust funds under special circumstances, which ought to be made to appear by the guardian. Allen v. Gaillard, 1 S. C. (1 Rich.) 279, 282.

BOND REQUIRED IN LEGAL PROCEEDING.

The clause in the stamp acts of the state and of the United States exempting from stamp duty those bonds which are "required in a legal proceeding" is not confined to those bonds without which no action could be maintained or prosecuted, but is more general, and means the bonds required to give any party to a legal proceeding any advantage or privilege to which he would be legally entitled, in the course of that proceeding, by executing a proper bond. Bowers v. Beck, 2 Nev. 157, 160.

BONDED DEBT.

A "bonded debt" is defined by some lexicographers to be that part of the entire indebtedness of a corporation or state which is represented by bonds it has issued, as distinguished from a floating debt. By others it is declared that it is a debt contracted under the obligation of a bond. The term "bonded debt," in the real as well as in the ordinary and generally accepted sense of the phrase, means not only the principal amount named in the bond, but also the sum of the interest which in the obligation is promised to be paid. If, however, the term "bonded debt" is not in every instance used to express the amount of both principal and interest, but sometimes to express the principal named, yet, if these words are in any case to be given that meaning, it must be so because of the context with which they are used, or from circumstances which show that the meaning of the phrase is to be restricted. As used in the Georgia Constitution, providing that the proceeds arising from the sale of public property owned by the state shall be applied to the payment of the bonded debt of the state, it includes the interest on the principal, as well as the principal itself, and an application of the money derived from such sales to the payment of interest was proper. Park v. Candler, 40 S. E. 523, 527, 114 Ga. 466.

Const. art. 12, § 11, forbidding corporations to incur "bonded indebtedness," except on certain conditions, does not embrace a nonnegotiable note and mortgage executed by a corporation to secure its indebtedness for money loaned, money paid, property purchased, or labor performed in the ordinary course of its authorized business, and actually received and used in such business. Underhill v. Santa Barbara Land, Bldg. & Imp. Co., 28 Pac. 1049, 1050, 93 Cal. 300.

BONDED WAREHOUSE.

See "Distillery Bonded Warehouse."

The term "bonded warehouse," as used in joint resolution of Congress of March 29, 1869, declaring that the proprietors of all internal revenue bonded warehouses shall reimburse the United States for expenses and salaries of all storekeepers put in charge of them, includes the distillery warehouses which distillers are required by the fifteenth section of the same act to keep situated on their distillery premises. United States v. Powell, 81 U. S. (14 Wall.) 493, 494, 20 L. Ed. 726.

BONDSMAN.

The word "bondsmen" is defined as a surety—one who is bound or gives surety for another; one who is bound by writing obligatory for the performance of the act of another—and as used in a will stating that from the share of a son should be deducted "an amount now unknown to me, which I, as one of his bondsmen, would have to pay for him," the word "bondsmen" did not necessarily import an obligation under seal. Haberstich v. Elliott, 59 N. E. 557, 558, 189 Ill. 70.

BONE BLACK.

Bone black is animal charcoal produced by burning bone or exposing it to the action of fire in the same manner that wood is exposed to the action of fire to produce vegetable charcoal. Schriefer v. Wood (U. S.) 21 Fed. Cas. 737, 738.

BONIFICATION.

Chief Justice Fuller, in United States v. Passavant, 169 U. S. 16, 23, 18 Sup. Ct. 219, 222, 42 L. Ed. 644, speaking of import duties, says: "Doubtless to encourage exportation and the introduction of German goods into other markets, the German government could remit or refund the tax, pay a bonus, or allow a drawback. And it is found that in respect of these goods, when purchased in bond or consigned while in bond for exportation to a foreign country, this duty is remitted by the German government, and is called 'bonification of tax,' as distinguished from being refunded as a rebate. The use of the word 'bonification' does not change the character of this remission. It is a special advantage extended by government in aid of manufacturers and trades, having the same effect as a bonus or drawback. To use one of the definitions of 'drawback,' it is a device resorted to for enabling a commodity affected by taxes to be exported and sold in the foreign market on the same terms as if it had not been taxed at all." Downs v. United States (U. S.) 113 Fed. 144, 148, 51 O. C. A. 100.

BONNET.

Tariff Act, par. 363, imposes a duty on flannels, blankets, hats of wool, knit goods and all goods made on knitting frames, etc., and paragraph 400 on bonnets, hats, and hoods for men, women, and children, composed of chip, grass, palm leaf, etc. Held, that the word "bonnet," in paragraph 400, was not sufficiently broad to include articles made of wool knit on frames, used as a covering for the head, and hence such articles were properly classified under paragraph 363. Toplitz v. Hedden (U. S.) 33 Fed. 617.

BONUM VACANS.

In Mason v. Hill, 5 Barn. & Adol. 1, the learned judge speaks of a distinction mentioned by the civilians between a river and its waters; the former being, as it were, a perpetual body, and under the dominion of those in whose territory it is contained; the latter continually changing, and incapable,

"while it is there," of becoming the subject of property. He adds: "It seems that the Roman law considered running water, not as a bonum vacans, in which any might acquire a property, but as public or common, in this sense only—that all might drink it or apply it to the necessary purposes of supporting life—and that no one had any property in the water itself, except in that particular portion which he might have abstracted from the stream, and of which he had the possession, and during the time of such possession only." Lux v. Haggin, 10 Pac. 674, 708, 69 Cal. 255.

BONUS.

"Bonus is a sum paid for services, or a thing given therefor, in addition to or in excess of what would ordinarily be given, but it is not a gift or gratuity. It is a premium given for a loan or a charter or other privilege granted to a company." Kenicott v. Wayne County, 83 U. S. (16 Wall.) 452, 471, 21 L. Ed. 319.

A bonus is a premium paid to a grantor, as a bank pays a bonus to the state for its charter—a consideration given for what is received. It implies an advantage—a benefit—given in return for the benefit received, or as an inducement to the grantor to confer that benefit. The term "bonus" has become a familiar one, and is associated, in its common acceptance, with the knowledge of some advantage, benefit, quid pro quo, stipulated for. Consolidated Bank v. State, 5 La. Ann. 44, 57.

Where banks, as the price for their charters, were required to contribute to the school fund, the tax or charge was the bonus or price or part of the price that they were to pay for their franchise. Gordon v. Appeal Tax Court, 44 U. S. (3 How.) 133, 145, 11 L. Ed. 529.

As premium on loan.

"Bonus," in its strict sense, means good. In its popular sense it denotes a premium for a loan. Leslie v. Leslie, 24 Atl. 319, 322, 50 N. J. Eq. (5 Dick.) 103.

The term "bonus," within an act authorizing savings associations to contract for a bonus on loans made, imports a definite sum to be paid at one time for the loan of money for a specified period, distinct from and independent of the interest. Mechanics' & Workingmen's Mut. Sav. Bank & Bldg. Ass'n v. Wilcox, 24 Conn. 147, 154.

Tax distinguished.

The power of taxation is an incident of sovereignty, and is coextensive with that of which it is an incident. All subjects, therefore, over which the sovereign power of the state extend, are, in its discretion, legitimate subjects of taxation, and this may be carried to any extent to which the Legislature may choose. On the other hand, the idea of a consideration is always present when we speak of a bonus, which is a premium to a grantor or vendor, or a consideration given for what is received. In Baltimore & O. R. R. Co. v. Maryland, 88 U. S. (21 Wall.) 456, 22 L. Ed. 678, the distinction between a tax and a bonus is clearly drawn. Commonwealth v. Erie & Western Transp. Co., 107 Pa. 112, 115.

A bonus is a "sum exacted by the state from a corporation for granting a charter. In such case it is clearly distinguished from a tax." 1 Bouv. Law Dict. (Rawle's Ed.) p. 254. The payment of such a bonus, as a consideration for the grant of the franchise to be a trading corporation, does not create a contract which implies a surrender by the state of any part of its taxing power. Commonwealth v. Bailey, Banks & Biddle Co., 20 Pa. Super. Ct. 210, 218.

BONUS BUILDING CONTRACT.

A bonus building contract is a plan adopted by real estate owners to induce builders to erect buildings on lots leased by the former; the amount of the bonus being added to the estimated value of the ground, and the ground rent being accordingly increased to secure returns on the investment. Andrew v. Meyerdirck, 40 Atl. 173, 174, 87 Md. 511.

BOODLE.

The word "boodle" is defined as "money fraudulently obtained in public service—especially money given to be received by officials in bribery, or gained by collusive contracts, appointments, etc.; by extension, gain from cheating of any kind. Often used attributively." See Cent. Dict. Where it is charged that a franchise has been procured by the use of boodle, the inference is that the persons granting the franchise were, as officials, bribed by money to make the grant. Boehmer v. Detroit Free Press Co., 94 Mich. 7, 9, 53 N. W. 822, 823, 34 Am. St. Rep. 318.

"The word 'boodle' has usually been applied to designate the money held to be paid or paid as a bribe for corrupt official action, and has mostly arisen in connection with the corruption of legislative action, although not limited to it. Its meaning may be said to be as broad as the use of money for any corrupt purpose—mostly confined to acts of an official character. It is therefore libelous." Byrnes v. Mathews, 12 N. Y. St. Rep. 74, 83.

See "On the Books"; "Taxbook"; "Text-Book."

As appliances, see "Appliance."

As personal property, see "Personal Property."

A "book," in its popular sense, is understood to be a volume, bound or unbound, written or printed. The term is derived from the Saxon word "boc" (beech tree). Scoville v. Toland (U. S.) 21 Fed. Cas. 863, 864.

One of the definitions given by Worcester of "book" is "a collection of paper leaves, sewed or bound, used for any kind of writing." Turbeville v. State, 56 Miss. 793, 798.

Paper books in the German language, for the use of children, containing illuminated lithographic prints, are not entitled to free entry, under Act July 24, 1897, c. 11, § 2, Free List, par. 502, 30 Stat. 196 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1681], as books and pamphlets printed exclusively in a foreign language. F. H. Petry & Co. v. United States (U. S.) 121 Fed. 207.

As books of account.

Under an insurance policy requiring the insured to keep a set of "books," the insurers must be held to have contracted with reference to the usages of the trade and the custom of merchants, and must have intended only such a set of books showing a complete record as good bookkeeping prescribed, and such as generally obtained among merchants engaged in a similar business. Western Assurance Co. v. Althelmer, 58 Ark. 565, 568, 25 S. W. 1067, 1069.

"Books," as used in the sheriff's return certifying to the levy on certain books, may mean only the physical articles, and is not to be taken as including debts due on accounts contained in such books. Tullis v. Brawley, 3 Minn. 277, 286 (Gil. 191, 197).

Blank books.

A "book" is commonly defined to be a number of sheets of paper, bound or stitched together, whether printed or blank. Thus we speak of a cashbook, a daybook, or merchant's account book. Ky. St. § 4218, provides that no person who sells books, pamphlets, or papers shall be deemed a peddler, within the statute requiring the license of peddlers; and it was held that a number of sheets of paper bound together, for the use of farmers in keeping a record of their transactions, with printed headings and some other printed matter, should be considered a book. Coffey v. Hendrick (Ky.) 65 S. W. 127, 128.

Manuscript notes.

A bequest of all "my books in and about my house," etc., includes manuscript notes of a physician of his attendance on a patient, which were bound up in volumes. Willis v. Curtols, 1 Beav. 189.

A manuscript may be a book. A bequest authorizing a legatee "to select such books as he may desire" out of the testator's library may include a manuscript copy of a book made by the testator. In re Beecher's Estate, 17 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 161, 162.

Pamphlet.

A pamphlet of 24 pages, consisting of a sheet and a half secured together by stitching, and with a cover of 4 pages, and having a title page, is properly described as a book in an indictment under the federal statutes forbidding the depositing in the mail of any obscene or indecent book or other publication. United States v. Bennett (U. S.) 24 Fed. Cas. 1093, 1104.

Private letter.

In construing the statute prohibiting the mailing of obscene books, pamphlets, pictures, papers, writings, prints, or other publication, etc., the United States Supreme Court, in United States v. Chase, 10 Sup. Ct. 756, 135 U. S. 255, 34 L. Ed. 117, say: "In the statute under consideration the word 'book' is used as one of a group or class of words, 'book, pamphlet, picture, paper, writing, print,' each of which is ordinarily and prima facie understood to be a publication; and the enumeration concludes with the general phrase 'or other publication,' which applies to all the articles enumerated, and defines each, with the common quality indicated. It must, therefore, according to a well-defined rule of construction, be a published writing which is contemplated by the statute, and not a private letter, on the outside of which there is nothing but the name and address of the person to whom it is written. United States v. Warner (U. S.) 59 Fed. 355, 356.

Stove patterns.

"Book or paper," as used in the New York Code, limiting the function of a subpoena duces tecum to the requirement that a witness produce "a book or paper," does not include stove patterns. In re Shephard (U. S.) 3 Fed. 12.

Work of two volumes.

An agreement to publish the memoirs of U. S. Grant declared that the parties were about to publish a book in two volumes, octavo form. Held that the use of such word "book" and the word "work" in the subsequent provisions of the contract had reference to the two volumes which composed the book and not each separate volume. Little v. Webster, 1 N. Y. Supp. 315, 317, 48 Hun, 620.

BOOK (In Copyright Law).

Though the legal definition of a book may be more extensive than that given by lexicographers, and may include a sheet of music as well as a bound volume, yet it necessarily conveys the idea of thought or conceptions clothed in language or in musical characters, written, printed, or published.

Its identity does not consist merely in the ideas, knowledge, or information communicated, but in the same conceptions, clothed in the same words, which make it the same compositions. Stowe v. Thomas (U. S.) 23 Fed. Cas. 201, 207.

Under Act 5 & 6 Vict. c. 45, § 2, relating to copyright, it is declared that, in the construction of the act, the word "book" shall be construed "to mean and include every volume, part or division of a volume, pamphlet, sheet of letter press, sheet of music," etc. Jollie v. Jacques (U. S.) 13 Fed. Cas. 910, 913.

As any composition.

Any composition, whether large or small, though found in company with other compositions, is a book, within 54 Geo. III, § 156, granting a copyright to the authors of books. White v. Geroch, 2 Barn. & Ald. 298, 301.

The term "book," within the meaning of the copyright laws, includes any composition, large or small, which includes results of successive mental processes rationally combined, whether it fill a great volume, or be contained in a single sheet. Keene v. Wheatley (U. S.) 14 Fed. Cas. 180, 194.

As blank applications.

"Book," as used in the act of Congress providing that a copyright may be granted to the author, etc., of any "book," etc., includes a blank form of application for a license to sell liquor at retail, composed of three applications, a petition upon a warrant, and a justification, all intended to be filled up and filed by the applicant. Brightley v. Littleton (U. S.) 37 Fed. 103, 104.

As bound volume.

In a copyright statute, "book" is not to be understood in its technical sense of a bound volume, but any species of publication which the author selects to embody his literary production. Under 4 Stat. 436, which provided that no person should be entitled to its benefits unless he should, before publication, deposit a printed copy of the title of his book as therein prescribed, the printing of a literary composition in serial parts in a magazine constituted a publication of the book, so that a subsequent copyrighting of the collective work, when completed and published in book form, would not prevent another from reprinting the uncopyrighted parts from the magazine. Holmes v. Hurst, 19 Sup. Ct. 606, 609, 174 U. S. 82, 43 L. Ed. 904.

Collected sheets of literary work.

The collected sheets containing, in orderly and connected fashion, the record of the intellectual and literary work of the author, is a "book," unless for some particular and special purpose a narrower definition is prescribed by law. In re Hempstead (U. S.) 95 Fed. 967, 968.

Musical compositions in book form.

In Copyright Act March 3, 1891, c. 565, § 3, 26 Stat. 1107 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3407], providing that, in case of a book, the two copies required to be delivered to the Librarian of Congress shall be manufactured in this country, a book does not include musical compositions published in book form or made by lithographic process. The word as used in the dictionaries has many different senses. It may refer to the subject-matter, as literary composition, or to form, as a number of leaves or paper bound together, or a written instrument or document, or a particular subdivision of a literary composition, or the words of an opera, etc. Littleton v. Oliver Ditson Co. (U. S.) 62 Fed. 597, 599.

Single sheet.

A single sheet of music is a book, within the meaning of 8 Ann. c. 19, relating to copyrights. Clementi v. Goulding, 11 East. 244.

The Latin word "liber" ("book") has no reference to the collection of writings in a volume, but primarily signifies the bark of a tree. Webster says "book" is derived from the Saxon "boe" meaning a beech tree. A single sheet may be considered a book. Drury v. Ewing (U. S.) 7 Fed. Cas. 1113, 1115.

"Book," as the term is used in English copyright statutes, has a very extended signification. It was held in Clementi v. Golding, 2 Camp. 25, to include a copyrighted song printed on a single sheet of paper, which decision was approved and followed in two cases arising under United States copyright statutes, in which it was held that a book, within these statutes, is not necessarily a book in the ordinary and common acceptance of the words, but may consist of a single sheet of paper, as well as a number of sheets bound together. Clayton v. Stone (U. S.) 5 Fed. Cas. 999, 1000 (citing Drury v. Ewing [U. S.] 7 Fed. Cas. 1113; Harper v. Shoppell [U. S.] 26 Fed. 519).

"Book," as used in copyright law, need not be a book in a common and ordinary acceptance of the word—that is, a volume made up of several sheets bound together—but it may be printed only on one sheet, as the words of a song and the music accompanying it. Clayton v. Stone (U. S.) 5 Fed. Cas. 999, 1000.

Trade label.

A trade label is not a book, within the provisions of the statute. Coffeen v. Brunton (U. S.) 5 Fed. Cas. 1184.

The term "book," within an act passed in 1851 providing for the recording of grants of lands in California in some book of record, was satisfied, within the meaning of the act, by copies of the deed on sheets not bound or fastened together in any manner, but folded; the name of the purchaser being indorsed thereon, and each distinct class kept in a separate bundle; the sheets not being bound into the form of books until 1856. Mumford v. Wardwell, 73 U. S. (6 Wall.) 423, 18 L. Ed. 756.

BOOK ACCOUNT.

In law the words "book account" have a well-settled meaning. A book account is detailed statement kept in a book, in the nature of debit and credits between persons, arising out of contract or some fiduciary relation. Rap. Law Dict. A less technical definition given by the general lexicographers is "an account or record of debit or credit kept in a book." See Webst. Dict. A memorandum kept in a small book as follows: "Alex and Anna sold the land to Henry Buck, March 4, 1886. $125.00. John Cosgrove paid $764, Jan. 6, 1888"—was not a book account. Taylor v. Horst, 52 Minn. 300, 303, 54 N. W. 734, 735.

A "book account" means a book as it is well known to be universally kept, containing a statement in detail of the transactions between parties, including prices, made contemporaneously with the transaction, and entered in a book. A tally on a board or loose sheets of paper does not constitute a book account. Stieglitz v. O. J. Lewis Mercantile Co., 76 Mo. App. 275, 280.

To constitute a book account, the account, in the first place, must be kept in a book. A tally or a board or a slate or loose sheets of paper is not a book account. Also it must be an account; that is, a formal statement in detail of the transaction between two parties, made contemporaneously with the transactions themselves. A list of charges and credits, without showing on its face against whom and in whose favor they are made, is not a book account; and the definition fails if the entries are not original, made at the time the transaction took place, or immediately thereafter. Richardson v. Wingate (Ohio) 10 West Law J. 145, 146.

"Book accounts," as used in a statute permitting parties to suits to be sworn to their book accounts, if not of more than 18 months' standing, cannot be construed to include a loose piece of paper on which an account is made out. It is not a book account, within the meaning of the statute. Kennedy v. Ankrim (Ohio) Tapp. 40.

The term "book account" is unknown in the law, and in common parlance it may mean money, goods, labor, and whatever may be brought into account. It is too indefinite to be used in an indictment charging forgery of "a receipt against a book account." State v. Dalton, 6 N. O. 379, 380.

Bond and mortgage.

The term "book account," as used in a will devising all testator's notes of hand and book accounts, could not be construed to embrace a debt due from one of the devisees to the testator, evidenced by a bond and mortgage. Hopkins v. Holt, 9 Wis. 228, 232.

Signed account.

The term "book account" may comprehend a signed account as well as an open one; and, where the judgment of a single magistrate appeared to be given on a warrant of more than $60 due by book account, it is to be taken, in support of the magistrate's jurisdiction, that the book account was a signed account. Turner v. Edwards, 19 N. C. 539.

Stubs of checkbook.

The stubs of a checkbook from which the checks have been cut, leaving the stub containing a memorandum of the amount, date, etc., of each check, is not a book account. Wilson v. Goodin (Ohio) Wright, 219.

BOOK DEBT.

A "book debt," as used in Act March 28, 1835, § 2, means debts for "goods sold and delivered, and for work, labor, and services." Hamill v. O'Donnell (Pa.) 2 Miles, 101.

A book debt does not include a checkbook containing a memorandum, on the margin opposite to the place where a check was cut, of the defendant's name, as the person to whom it was given, the amount, date, etc., to prove the giving of the money evidenced by the check, as a loan. Wilson v. Goodin (Ohio) Wright, 219.

BOOK DEBT (Action of).

A form of common-law action to recover a debt which was the subject of a book account. Bowers v. Dunn (Conn.) 2 Root, 59; Mills v. St. John, Id. 188; Mnor v. Erving's Ex'rs (Conn.) 1 Kirby, 158; Phenix v. Prindle, Id. 207; Peck v. Jones, Id. 289.

The action of book debt was a statutory action in Connecticut, founded on book accounts. Terrill v. Beecher, 9 Conn. 344, 348.

The action of book debt is an action to recover on an account, and is only maintainable where the gist of the action is for accounts which are properly chargeable as items of account; hence the action cannot be maintained to recover a balance on an account stated or agreed to be paid by a special promise, for which assumpsit will lie. Stocking v. Sage, 1 Conn. 75. It does not lie, however, for use in occupation of real estate. Beech v. Mills, 5 Conn. 493. It does not apply to a right of action for damages for tort or breach of contract, such claims never having been held to be proper subjects of book accounts. Green v. Pratt, 11 Conn. 205, 206.

An action of book debt includes all actions of debt or on the case which might previously have been brought, in which plaintiff would have declared either emisit, indebitatus assumpsit, quantum valebant, or quantum meruit, for goods, wares, and merchandise by him sold and delivered, or for work and labor done and performed. The action, therefore, was maintainable to recover for the hire of a horse and wagon, which, though not "work and labor," in the strict acceptance of that term, is so in substance. Easley v. Eakin, 3 Tenn. (Cooke) 388.

An action of book debt is an action for the recovery of a balance due on a book account for such claims for services rendered or property sold as may be properly the subject of a book account, which may properly include lottery tickets regularly issued and authorized by the laws of Vermont, which were sold as chances on books, the value of which may be properly recovered in an action of book debt. May v. Brownell, 3 Vt. 463, 469.

The action of book debt will lie for work and services performed by plaintiff for defendant, which services were such as are usually charged on book, and being in themselves proper subjects of book charge. A special agreement as to the mode of payment—as to make payment in cattle—will not preclude plaintiff from the right to charge them on book, and sue for them in the action of book debt. Newton v. Higgins, 2 Vt. 366, 369.

BOOK ENTRIES.

Under the old affidavit of defense law, the defendant was not put to his affidavit of defense unless the copy of book account filed showed a prima facie case. "Book entries" meant the entries in the original book, which should be competent to go to the jury as evidence of plaintiff's claim. Book entries were required to be a registry of a sale and delivery, actually made, of the thing therein contained, and the time of their being so entered. Fairchild v. Dennison (Pa.) 4 Watts, 258. And a book account showing, as the one filed does, lump charges for merchandise, was invariably held insufficient. Appel v. Stein (Pa.) 6 Wkly. Notes Cas. 451. A statement of claim alleged that the suit was for merchandise sold, furnished, and delivered August 17, 1892; and the copy of book account was, "To merchandise, August 17, 1892." Held, that the item was insufficient to require an affidavit of defense. Loeb v. Heere, 19 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 641, 642.

Act March 25, 1835 (P. L. 88), declares that in all actions instituted for the recovery of book debts to entitle the plaintiff to a judgment for want of an affidavit of defense, he shall file in the office of the prothonotary, within two weeks after the return of the original process, a copy of the book entries on which the action has been brought. Held, that the term "book entries," as used in that act, meant the entries in plaintiff's book of original entry, which, under ordinary rules of evidence, would be competent to go to the jury as evidence in support of plaintiff's claim. Hamill v. O'Donnell (Pa.) 2 Miles, 101 (cited and approved in Wall v. Dovey, 60 Pa. [10 P. F. Smith] 212, 213).

BOOK OF ACCOUNT.

See "Proper Books of Account."

Worcester defines a "book" as "a collection of paper leaves, sewed or bound, used for any kind of writing." The assessment levies, usually called "rolls," constitute a book of accounts. That it is used by law for the keeping of accounts of a municipality against the taxpayers, as well as to show the state of accounts between the city and its collector, we know officially, as well as by the proof in the records, so that, in every point of view, the assessment roll was a book of accounts, within Code, § 2582, declaring every person guilty of perjury, who, with the intent to defraud, "shall make any false entry in any book of accounts kept in any public office," etc. Turbeville v. State, 56 Miss. 793, 798.

Code Iowa, § 3658, providing that "books of account" are receivable in evidence, etc., means a book containing charges, and showing a continuous dealing with persons generally. A book, to be admissible, must be kept as an account book, and the charges made in the usual course of business. Security Co. v. Graybeal, 52 N. W. 497, 498, 85 Iowa, 543, 39 Am. St. Rep. 311.

A statute permitting the admission in evidence of books of account meant books as it was known they were universally kept, which was by entering therein not only the articles sold or received in payment, but also the prices. Colbert v. Piercy, 25 N. C. 77, 80.

"Books of account," as used in a policy of fire insurance providing that, if required, the assured shall produce books of account and other proper vouchers, original or duplicate invoices, and all property thereby insured, whether damaged or not damaged, indicates and implies such books of account only as related, like the other proper vouchers, original or duplicate invoices, to the property thereby insured, or to the business of the plaintiff connected therewith. Pierson

v. Springfield Fire & Marine Ins. Co. (Del.) 81 Atl. 966, 972, 7 Houst. 307.

The general rule established throughout all the courts in this state, allowing books of account to be introduced in evidence in their owners' favor, extends to no other entries than for goods and articles sold, work, labor, and services performed by a man, and means and materials provided. Wilson v. Wilson, 6 N. J. Law (2 Southard) 95, 96.

Within the meaning of Rev. St. c. 126, § 17, making it larceny to take any book of accounts for or concerning money or goods due, or to become due, or to be delivered, etc., a book of accounts would include a book kept by a person who works for a tailor by the piece, and in which entries are made of the names of persons owning the garments worked upon, and the price of the work done. Commonwealth v. Williams, 50 Mass. (9 Metc.) 273, 276.

A book of account is a record of sales or other transactions involving credits and debts, and a book containing minutes of cash paid, only, is not properly a book of account. Parris v. Bellows' Estate, 52 Vt. 351.

A diary kept by decedent, wherein all the transactions of the day are noted, is not an account book, and cannot be admitted in evidence as such. Costello v. Crowell, 2 N. E. 698, 700, 139 Mass. 588.

BOOK OF ORIGINAL ENTRIES.

A book of original entries is one in which a detailed history of business transactions is entered. It, in general, corresponds with the daybook in bookkeeping. It is not necessary, in order to constitute a book one of original entries, that it should be the very first memoranda made of the transaction; and hence the fact that memoranda were made, by a servant of a merchant, of meat delivered at the time, from which memoranda the bookkeeper entered original charges against the customers, did not render the book in which such charges were entered the less a book of original entries. Ingraham v. Bockius (Pa.) 9 Serg. & R. 285, 287, 11 Am. Dec. 730.

Whether a book is one of original entries depends to a large extent on the nature and character of the subject-matter of the item, and the nature and character of the evidence outside of the book which naturally exists to prove the item. Thus, in Leighton v. Manson, 14 Me. (2 Shep.) 208, the book of original entries was held incompetent to prove an account of two charges for beef bearing date the same day, one for 355 pounds and another for 360 pounds; the exclusion appearing to have been sustained by reason of the articles having been of such bulk and weight that they were not deliverable without assistance, and therefore better evidence than the book was attainable. See, also, Thomas v. Dyott (S. C.) 1 Nott & McC. 186; Pelzer v. Cranston (S. C.) 2 McCord, 328; Shoemaker v. Kellogg, 11 Pa. (1 Jones) 310. The charges, in order to be admissible, must be reasonably specific and particular. This is the more necessary, inasmuch as, when received, the books are prima facie evidence both of the item charged and the price in value carried out. Corr v. Sellers, 100 Pa. 169, 170, 171, 45 Am. Rep. 370.

Books of original entries are books kept for the purpose of charging goods sold and delivered, in which the entries are made contemporaneously with the delivery of the goods, and by the person whose duty it was for the time being to make them. The entry must be made at the delivery of the goods or immediately after—at or about the time when there is a transmutation of the property from the seller to the buyer. Laird v. Campbell, 100 Pa. 159, 165.

Where a butcher carried meats around in a cart, and made his original entries on the cart in chalk scores, which were transferred to the books on the same day, whereupon the scores were rubbed off and new scores made as the meat was delivered from time to time, if they were honestly made on the cart and honestly transferred to the book, the book is a book of original entry. Smith v. Sanford, 29 Mass. (12 Pick.) 139, 140, 22 Am. Dec. 415.

A book into which it appeared that entries were transcribed from time to time, as the parties had leisure, from a counter book or blotter, was not a book of original entries, though the plaintiff had stated on his voir dire that it was such. Breinig v. Meitzler, 23 Pa. (11 Harris) 156.

BOOKS OF RECORD.

The words "books of record," in their ordinary sense, when applied to a statute providing that the "books of record" of a justice shall be open to inspection, do not include the files and entries thereon, which are but the material from which the record is to be made, but they plainly apply to the books in which the statute requires that the record shall be made up and written out. Perkins v. Cummings, 29 Atl. 675, 676, 68 Vt. 485.

BOOKKEEPER.

"Bookkeeper," as used in the bond of a person employed as "bookkeeper and collector," conditioned for the faithful performance of his duties and pay over all moneys received in that capacity, did not of itself indicate an employment which would give control of the entire cash in a job printing business, the volume of which amounted to from $80,000 to $100,000 a year, so as to make the sureties liable for moneys lost by reason of their principal acting as cashier of the business. Kellogg v. Scott, 44 Atl. 190, 192, 58 N. J. Eq. 344.

As a clerk.

A bookkeeper is in one sense a clerk. Any person who performs clerical duties is in one sense a clerk, but a bookkeeper is not a clerk, within the meaning of the statute authorizing service of process on certain officers or a clerk of a corporation. Chambers v. King Wrought-Iron Bridge Manufactory, 16 Kan. 270, 276.

A bookkeeper who, from his isolated position, can have but little means of knowledge personally as to the transactions done or the information relating thereto, except what is derived from others, is not a clerk, within the rule excluding books of account kept by a party who keeps a clerk. McGoldrick v. Traphagen, 88 N. Y. 334, 335.

As employé or laborer.

See "Employé"; "Laborer."

BOOKKEEPING.

"Bookkeeping" is defined as the art of recording in a systematic manner the transactions of merchants, traders, and other persons engaged in pursuits connected with money; the art of keeping accounts. In the commercial world bookkeeping has come to be a distinct profession—an exact science—requiring peculiar adaptation and thorough training on the part of those who would master the subject. Western Assur. Co. v. Altheimer, 25 S. W. 1067, 1069, 58 Ark. 565

BOOKMAKING.

"Bookmaking" is the recording or registering of bets or wagers on any trial or contest of speed or power of endurance of man or beast, or selling pools. Murphy v. Board of Police (N. Y.) 11 Abb. (N. C.) 337, 338, 63 How. Prac. 396, 399.

The word "bookmaking" imports some method of recording bets. New York v. Bennett (U. S.) 113 Fed. 515, 516.

As applicable to clerk.

A clerk who attends his employer on a race track, and records in a book bets which his employer makes on the races, but makes no bets himself, is not guilty of bookmaking, within Pen. Code, § 351, providing a punishment for such offense. People v. Fallon, 46 N. E. 302, 304, 152 N. Y. 1, 37 L. R. A. 419.

As gambling on horse races.

The business of bookmaking is betting on horse races, and is called "bookmaking" because the bets are booked or a record kept of them in a book. Spies v. Rosenstock, 39 Atl. 268, 269, 87 Md. 14.

A fair association made a contract selling the exclusive bookmaking privileges on its race track for a certain period. Held, that the term "bookmaking" in the contract was but another name for betting and gambling in horse races, as in bookmaking the betting is with bookmakers. Ullman v. St. Louis Fair Ass'n, 66 S. W. 949, 951, 167 Mo. 273.

BOOM.

A boom is an inclosure or artificial harbor for logs and lumber, of which one side is furnished ordinarily by the natural bank of the stream, and the other is provided by the piers and timbers or other obstruction to the passage of logs which connect them together. Appeal of Powers, 17 Atl. 254, 256, 125 Pa. 175, 11 Am. St. Rep. 882.

A boom consists not only of the timber by which the commodity boomed is inclosed, but also the piers, piles, or other things by which it is held in place; and piles to which the boom-stick is secured are a part of the boom, as well as the piles in the dock to which the other extremity of the boom-stick is fastened. John Spry Lumber Co. v. The C. H. Green, 43 N. W. 576, 579, 76 Mich. 320.

The word "boom," as used in the logging business as a part of the term "boom and deliver," means to completely inclose logs floating in a boom chained, and fastened together at the ends ready to be delivered in a raft. Gaspar v. Heimbach, 60 N. W. 1080, 59 Minn. 102; Gaspar v. Heimbach, 53 Minn. 414, 55 N. W. 559.

An authority given to a corporation to boom lumber and receive tolls does not entitle it to demand tolls for driving lumber, as driving lumber is not included in the term "booming" lumber. Bangor Boom Corp. v. Whiting, 29 Me. (16 Shep.) 123.

BOOMAGE.

The word "boomage" is a term of rather indefinite meaning. The usual definition of a "boom" is an inclosure formed upon the surface of a stream or other body of water by means of spars, for the purpose of collecting or storing logs or timber; and boomage, as used in a contract giving a right of boomage, would be for the purpose of entering on the land to fasten booms and boom sticks, as might be reasonably necessary to the maintenance and operation of the boom. Farrand v. Clarke, 65 N. W. 361, 362, 63 Minn. 181.

BOOSTER.

"Booster" is a technical term used in gambling establishments describing a person who, in the interest of the proprietor, takes a hand in the game to keep it from stopping for want of a sufficient number of players, and who is furnished money to bet with, and allowed to keep his winnings as compensation for his services. Ex parte Meyer (Cal.) 40 Pac. 953.

BOOTH.

"Booth," as used in Pen. Code, § 504, providing that the term "building," as used in section 498, defining "burglary," shall include a booth, means a house or shed built of boards or other slight materials for temporary occupation. People v. Hagan, 14 N. Y. Supp. 233, 234, 60 Hun, 577.

An ordinance prohibiting liquor dealers from constructing or maintaining any "stall, booth, or other inclosure" in any room or building where liquor is sold will be limited to inclosures which are or may be used as lounging or drinking places, or for any immoral purpose, and not such as are innocent and necessary inclosures. State v. Barge, 84 N. W. 911, 913, 82 Minn. 256

BOOTY.

In all works on international law, captures of personal property by land forces on land are spoken of as "booty." United States v. Two Hundred and Sixty-Nine and One-Half Bales of Cotton (U. S.) 28 Fed. Cas. 302, 309.

Chancellor Kent says: In a land war movable property, after it has been in the complete possession of the enemy 24 hours, goes by the name of "booty," and not "prize," and becomes absolutely his without any right of postliminy. 1 Kent, Comm. (Last Ed.) 120. Vattel says: As the towns and lands taken from the enemy are called "conquests," all movable property taken from him comes under the denomination of "booty." This booty naturally belongs to the sovereign prosecuting the war, no less than his conquests. Coolidge v. Guthrie (U. S.) 6 Fed. Cas. 461, 463.

BORAX.

Borax is a salt formed by boracic acid and soda. In re Schaeffer (D. C.) 2 App. Cas. 1, 8.

BORDERING.

In Acts 1894, c. 380, § 46, providing that the owner of any land "bordering" on any of the navigable waters of the state, the lines of which extend into and are covered by such waters, shall have the exclusive privilege of using the same for protecting oysters within the lines of his own land,

"bordering" means approaching; coming near; verging. It conveys the idea of immediate proximity. Handy v. Maddox, 37 Atl. 222, 225, 85 Md. 547.

As adjoining.

"Bordering," as used in Act March 22, 1895, § 8 (P. L. p. 424), requiring a petition for review of an improvement assessment to be signed by the owners of at least two-thirds, either in lineal feet or in area, of the lands and real estate fronting or bordering on the road or section of road to be improved, means adjoining at some point the road or section of road involved. Erisman v. Chosen Freeholders of Burlington County, 45 Atl. 998, 999, 64 N. J. Law, 516.

Under the act of Congress of March 3, 1811, providing that every person who owns a tract of land bordering on any river, creek, or water course in the territory of Orleans, and not exceeding in depth 40 arpents, shall be entitled to a preference on becoming a purchaser of any vacant tract of land adjacent thereto, the word "bordering" means to front on a navigable water course. Surgett v. Lapice, 49 U. S. (8 How.) 48, 69, 12 L. Ed. 982.

As within.

"Bordering on," as used in a charter providing that no part of the expense of grading or paving a street shall be assessed on any lands not "bordering on or touching" the street, does not apply to or include a street railroad in the street, and hence such railroad could not be assessed. Indianapolis & V. Ry. Co. v. Capitol Pav. & Const. Co., 54 N. E. 1076, 1077, 24 Ind. App. 114 (citing O'Reilly v. City of Kingston, 114 N. Y. 439, 21 N. E. 1004).

BORN.

See "Natural Born."

"Born," as ordinarily understood and in fact, means 'brought forth,' and a child is completely born when delivered or expelled from and becomes external of the mother, whether the placenta has been separated or the cord cut or not." Goff v. Anderson, 15 S. W. 866, 91 Ky. 303, 11 L. R. A. 825.

A child en ventre sa mere for all purposes for his own benefit is considered as absolutely born. He takes by descent, and in executory devises is a life in being. Swift v. Duffield (Pa.) 5 Serg. & R. 38, 40.

A premature birth is not of a character to give completeness to the inchoate right of an infant in esse to take by devise or descent. Harper v. Archer, 12 Miss. (4 Smedes & M.) 99, 108, 43 Am. Dec. 472.

The use of the words "born or to be born" in a will bequeathing property to the children of a person named when they attain the age of 21 are not sufficient in themselves to show an intention that after-born children shall take, and therefore such language does not create an exception to the rule that such a bequest only applies to the children born at the period fixed for distribution. Helsse v. Markland (Pa.) 2 Rawle, 274, 275, 21 Am. Dec. 445.

BORN ALIVE.

In an indictment for child murder, "born alive" means that the whole body must be brought into the world alive, and it is not sufficient that the child respires in the progress of the birth. Rex v. Poulton, 5 Car. & P. 329, 330.

"Alive," as used in defining an element of an estate by curtesy requiring that a child should be born alive, means that it should be alive and have an independent life of its own for some period after delivery. There is no legal presumption in such a case in favor of the separate life of a newly born child, and, while respiration or breath is evidence of such life and existence, proof of respiration from actual observation is not necessary to establish the fact. Other indications of life, such as the beating of the heart, and the pulsation of the arteries after the separation of the child from the body of the mother, may be satisfactory evidence of it, because they show the fact that circulation has been established and is maintained and carried on in the body of the child independently of the mother, and proof of such fact sufficiently establishes independent life of the child for the purpose of curtesy. Canon v. Killen (Del.) 5 Houst. 14, 19.

BOROUGH.

Any borough, see "Any."
As town, see "Town."

"Boroughs" are very ancient municipal organizations, with well-defined powers, privileges, duties, and liabilities. We inherited an aptness for their organization from England, and the word conveys the idea adopted from England of a compact settlement, as distinguished from a township and county. So, through all legislation since, the suggestion in thought is of a town or village identical with the borough. Dempster v. United Traction Co., 54 Atl. 501, 503, 205 Pa. 70.

A borough is a mere agency of the state for governmental purposes. City of Philadelphia v. Fox, 64 Pa. (14 P. F. Smith) 169, 180; Darby v. Sharon, 112 Pa. 66, 4 Atl. 722. The powers and rights of boroughs are regulated by the statutes under which they are created, and are confined to the particular subjects therein referred to. Webster v. Hopewell Borough, 19 Pa. Super. Ct. 549, 554 (citing Millerstown Borough v. Bell, 123 Pa. 151, 16 Atl. 612).

Town is a generic word. Of the genus, cities and boroughs are species. New York & L. B. R. Co. v. Drummond, 46 N. J. Law (17 Vroom) 644, 646.

The words "borough" and "village" are to be understood as duplicate or cumulative names of the same thing, and proof of either will sustain an indictment using the other. Brown v. State, 18 Ohio St. 496, 507.

BORROW.

All borrowed money, see "All."

It is true we often use this word in the sense of returning the thing borrowed in specie, as to borrow a horse. But it is not limited to this sense. Among the definitions given by Webster are the following: First, "to take or receive from another on trust, with the intention of returning or giving an equivalent for"; and, second, "to take from another for one's own use; to adopt from a foreign source; to appropriate; to assume." We need not give the apt illustrations with which the learned lexicographer adorns his text. While the borrowing of money is usually accompanied with a contract for the return of the principal at a stated time, it is not always nor necessarily so. The object of loaning money is to obtain a return in the way of interest. The interest is the consideration for the loan; the hire or price which is paid for the use of it. If I agree to pay $60 for the use of $1,000 for one year, it is a borrowing of money. It is equally so if I contract at the same rate for the use of it for ten years. Is it any the less so when the contract is perpetual and the loan irredeemable? The equivalent is paid annually in the shape of interest. We do not think trading corporations any more than individuals are restricted in their moneyed transactions to the narrow meaning of the word "borrow." In its broader sense it implies a contract for the use of money. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. v. Stichter (Pa.) 11 Wkly. Notes Cas. 325, 327.

"The word 'borrow' is often used in the sense of returning the thing borrowed in specie; as to borrow a book or any other thing to be returned again. But it is evident that where money is borrowed the identical money loaned is not to be returned, because if this was so the borrower would derive no benefit from the loan. In the broad sense of the term, it means a contract for the use of money." And it is so used in Act Feb. 15, 1869, § 30, authorizing school districts to borrow money. State v. School Dist. No. 4, 12 N. W. 812, 815, 13 Neb. 82.

"Borrow money," as used in United States Constitution, which gives to Congress power to borrow money on the credit of the United States, is the power to raise money for the public use on the pledge of the public credit, and it may be exercised to meet either present or anticipated expenses and liabilities of the government. It includes the power to issue, in return for the money borrowed, the obligations of the United States in any appropriate form—as stocks, bonds, bills, or notes. The Legal Tender Cases, 4 Sup. Ct. 122, 128, 110 U. S. 421, 28 L. Ed. 204.

As contracting debts.

"Borrowing money," as used in a Constitution providing the grounds for borrowing money or contracting debts by a municipal corporation, is not the same as contracting debts. Ketchum v. City of Buffalo (N. Y.) 21 Barb. 294, 305.

Change in nature of obligation.

Where a note was given by a corporation in exchange for a partnership note held by the bank, which the corporation had assumed, the corporation, in effect, borrowed from the bank the amount of such note. Herman v. Hecht, 48 Pac. 611, 612, 116 Cal. 553.

A contract by a city to pay a person who has assumed the payment of interest on some of the city's debt is not a "borrowing of money," but is a contract for the payment of a debt. Gelpcke v. Dubuque, 68 U. S. (1 Wall.) 221, 223, 17 L. Ed. 519.

Guaranty of payment.

A power to a city to borrow money for works of internal improvement authorizes the city to make a guaranty of the payment of bonds issued by railroad companies for money to pay debts incurred for constructions already made and for after improvements. City of Savannah v. Kelly, 2 Sup. Ct. 468, 471, 108 U. S. 184, 27 L. Ed. 696.

Hiring distinguished.

Borrowing is a mere gratuitous loan. It is a species of bailment called by Sir William Jones a commodatum, or loan for use without pay. Blackstone, in distinguishing between hiring and borrowing, says "hiring and borrowing are contracts by which a qualified property may be transferred to the hirer or borrower, in which there is only this difference: that hiring is always for a price, a stipend, or additional recompense; borrowing is merely gratuitous." An agreement by which a person undertakes to make a horse gentle, and fit for use of the owner's family, in consideration of permission to ride it, is a contract of hiring, and not a borrowing. Neel v. State, 26 S. W. 726, 33 Tex. Cr. R. 408.

Issuing bonds or notes.

The power to borrow money to pay debts, given to a municipality, includes the power to issue bonds. In substance, the money is borrowed from the purchasers of the bonds. It is advanced on the faith of the state's obligations. Commonwealth v. Select and Common Council of City of Pittsburgh, 34 Pa. (10 Casey) 496, 511.

The term "borrow money," or the right to borrow money, as applied to a municipal or other corporation, is a power to create indebtedness, and procure for its payment funds from others, to be paid at a future date, and implies the power to issue bonds or other evidences of indebtedness to secure the payment of the funds borrowed. Orchard v. School Dist. No. 70, 15 N. W. 730, 14 Neb. 378.

"Borrow," as used in Acts 1869, § 60, declaring that school districts shall have power to borrow money, means the power to make a contract for the use of money, to be repaid at a later date. The power to borrow money carries with it the authority to determine the time of payment, and to issue bonds or other evidence of indebtedness therefor. "Borrow," as defined by Webster, is "to take or receive from another on trust, with intention of returning or giving an equivalent therefor, or to take from another for one's own use; to adopt from a foreign service; to appropriate; to assume." State v. School Dist. No. 4, 13 Neb. 82, 12 N. W. 812.

The phrase "to borrow money on the credit of the United States," as used in the federal constitution, designating a power vested in the national government, should not receive that limited and restricted interpretation and meaning which it would have in a penal statute, or in an authority conferred by law or by contract on trustees or agents for private purposes. The power to borrow money on the credit of the United States is a power to raise money for the public use on a pledge of the public security, and may be exercised to meet either present or anticipated expenses and liabilities of the government. It includes the power to issue, in return for the money borrowed, the obligation of the United States in any appropriate form of stock, bonds, bills, or notes; and, in whatever form they are issued, being instruments of the national government, they are exempted from taxation by the governments of the states. The Legal Tender Cases, 4 Sup. Ct. 122, 128, 110 U. S. 421, 28 L. Ed. 204.

The power given county commissioners to "borrow" money on credit of the county authorizes them to issue bonds, as the power to borrow carries with it the power to issue the ordinary evidences of a loan. Board of County Commissioners v. Lewis, 10 Sup. Ct. 286, 290, 133 U. S. 198, 33 L. Ed. 604.

Under a statute authorizing a town to borrow money to aid in the construction of a road, a sale of bonds at par, and paying over the proceeds to the company, was a substantial borrowing. Scipio v. Wright, 101 U. S. 605, 673, 25 L. Ed. 1037.

The power to borrow money for the erection of a courthouse does not authorize the issuing of bonds for that purpose. Lewis v. Sherman County Com'rs (U. S.) 5 Fed. 269, 272.

The power given to the federal government to borrow money was agreed by all the justices in the legal tender cases to authorize the issuance of government notes. Legal Tender Cases, 79 U. S. (12 Wall.) 457, 639, 20 L. Ed. 287.

Loan of credit.

A corporate power to borrow money, through it might doubtless well be held to include the power to execute the obligation or security for payment, cannot be construed to authorize the loan of the credit of the city to a corporation for its private and corporate purposes. Chamberlain v. City of Burlington, 19 Iowa, 395, 402.

Payment distinguished.

There is a difference between borrowing money and the paying of an indebtedness. The purchase of a lot and agreeing to pay the consideration therefor is not borrowing money. City of Richmond v. McGirr, 78 Ind. 192, 193.

Perpetual loan.

In its broadest sense, "borrow" implies a contract for the use of money, and, where a corporation had authority to borrow money, it had the power to contract for a perpetual loan, since such a contract only implies the voluntary loan of a sum of money, the repayment of which is not to be demanded, presumably for some benefit to the lender. Appeal of Philadelphia & R. R. Co. (Pa.) 39 Leg. Int. 98.

Possession implied.

An information charging that defendant did "borrow and obtain the use of" a ring sufficiently charges that he obtained the possession of the same. State v. Kasper, 31 Pac. 636, 637, 5 Wash. 174.

Promise to repay or return implied.

"The idea of borrowing is not filled out unless there is an agreement therefor; a promise or understanding that what is borrowed will be repaid or returned—the thing itself, or something like it, of equal value—with or without compensation for the use of it in the meantime. To borrow is the reciprocal action with lend or to loan, which is the parting with a thing of value to another for a time fixed or indefinite, yet to have some time an ending, to be used and enjoyed by that other, and the thing itself, or the equivalent of it, to be given back at the time, or when lawfully asked for, with or without compensation for the use, as may be agreed upon." Kent v. Quicksilver Min. Co., 78 N. Y. 159, 177.

A writing stating, "borrowed from H. $270.00 for which I place in his hands as security a negro girl," etc., imports an obligation to return the thing borrowed, or to return its kind and value, and constitutes an acknowledgment by the borrower that he had agreed to refund the amount borrowed, or was under a legal obligation to do so. Hart v. Burton, 30 Ky. (7 J. J. Marsh.) 322, 324.

A note containing a recital, "I have borrowed," etc., "for the benefit of my father," imports a promise to repay the amount borrowed as strongly as if the word "due" had been used, and hence the instrument constituted a note for the direct payment of money. Harrow v. Dugan, 36 Ky. (6 Dana) 341.

Receiving deposits.

"Receiving deposits," as understood in the practice of banking, is different from borrowing money, in the ordinary acceptance of that term; and agreeing to allow interest on moneys deposited with a bank, and giving notes or certificates or any other evidence of debt therefor, does not constitute the doing so an act of borrowing. Hence the power of receiving deposits does not necessarily include the power of borrowing. Leavitt v. Yates (N. Y.) 4 Edw. Ch. 134, 172.

BORROWER.

Any borrower, see "Any."

The borrower is the servant of the lender. Dunton v. Sharpe, 70 Miss. 850, 864, 12 South. 800, 801.

The term "borrower," in the usury law, designates only the party bound by the original contract to pay the loan. Wright v. Clapp (N. Y.) 28 Hun, 7, 8; Schermerhorn v. Talman, 14 N. Y. 93, 126; Wheelock v. Lee, 64 N. Y. 242, 247.

Devisee.

The term "borrower," as used in 1 Rev. St. § 8, declaring the payment or offer of payment of a sum borrowed at usurious interest to be unnecessary, as a condition precedent to a suit by the borrower for relief against such loan, does not include a devisee of lands mortgaged to secure such usurious loan by the testator. Buckingham v. Corning, 91 N. Y. 525, 530, 64 How. Prac. 503, 506.

General assignee.

In the usury law the term borrower "designates only the party bound by the original contract to pay the loan." It does not include a general assignee of an insolvent debtor. Wright v. Clapp (N. Y.) 28 Hun, 7, 8.

The tendency of judicial opinion is to limit the application of the word "borrower," as it is used in the usury laws, to the person who borrowed the money, and was at the time a party to the contract, and who continued to stand in the position of borrower. In Schermerhorn v. Talman, 14 N. Y. (4 Kern.) 93, it was held that the actual borrower, who had after the usurious loan become bankrupt, and subsequently repurchased the property covered by the usurious loan on a sale by the assignee in bankruptcy, could not maintain an action to set aside the usurious security; the decision proceeding on the ground that, though he was the borrower in fact, he had lost his character as such by the transfer and repurchase of the property, and was not entitled to the benefit of the act. An assignee in bankruptcy cannot maintain an action to compel a lender to deliver up collaterals turned out by the bankrupt to secure a usurious loan, or to have an obligation given by him therefor declared void, without paying or offering to pay the sum loaned, because the assignee is not a "borrower," within the meaning of Laws 1837, c. 430, authorizing a borrower to file his bill for relief without payment or deposit of the sum loaned; the word "borrower," in the statute, designating only the party bound by the original contract to pay the loan. Wheelock v. Lee, 64 N. Y. 242, 247.

Grantee of mortgaged premises.

The term "borrower" has a well-known and definite meaning. It is used in contradistinction to "lender," and is intended to designate one of the parties to a contract for the loan; and may be extended to those standing in his place in a representative capacity, as heirs at law, executors, or administrators. The term as used in the statutes relating to usury does not include a subsequent grantee of premises covered by a usurious mortgage. Post v. Bank of Utica (N. Y.) 7 Hill, 391, 397.

"Borrower," as used in Laws 1837, p. 486, § 4, providing that any borrower of money, goods, or things in action may file a bill for relief against usury, without offering to pay any part of the sum loaned, does not embrace the grantee of property covered by a usurious incumbrance. Schermerhorn v. Talman, 14 N. Y. (4 Kern.) 93, 126.

Under Laws 1837, p. 487, "borrower" is not to be restricted to the individual to whom the loan was made, but embraces his sureties, heirs, devisees, and personal representatives, and may include a subsequent grantee who took the premises subject to a usurious mortgage. Cole v. Savage (N. Y.) 10 Paige, 583, 588.

The purchaser of an equity of redemption is not a borrower, so as to relieve him from the prior usurious mortgage. Bissell v. Kellogg, 65 N. Y. 432, 438.

Indorser.

"Borrower," as used in 3 Rev. St. (5th Ed.) p. 73, §§ 8, 74, 13, declaring that the borrower shall be entitled to defend against usurious interest charged, does not mean and is not limited to the person who actually borrowed and received the money, as such, but includes, as well, indorsers and others liable on usurious paper, who, being liable for the payment of the usurious interest, are embraced within the term "borrower" as it is there used. Hungerford's Bank v. Potsdam & W. R. Co., 10 Abb. Prac. 24, 25.

Receiver of corporation.

1 Rev. St. p. 772, § 8, which provides that a borrower need not offer to pay interest or principal in order to maintain a suit in equity against a usurious security, does not include an accommodation indorser of a note, who did no act toward procuring the loan, except to indorse the note. Allerton v. Belden, 49 N. Y. 373, 376. CONTRA, see National Bank v. Lewis, 75 N. Y. 516, 523, 31 Am. Rep. 484.

The term "borrower," as used in Act 1837, to prevent usury, means, not only the principal debtor, but also any privy to the transaction, as a survey, heir, devisee, or personal representative of the person to whom the loan was made, and hence includes a receiver of an insolvent corporation. Leavitt v. De Launcy (N. Y.) 4 Sandf. Ch. 281, 298.

Sureties.

"Borrowers," as used in Act May, 1837, entitled "An act to prevent usury," and enacting that borrowers may come into a court of chancery, either for discovery or relief, without making any deposit or payment, means not only the one who obtains the money borrowed, but also embraces a surety. Post v. Boardman (Pa.) 1 Clarke, 523, 527; Hungerford's Bank v. Dodge (N. Y.) 30 Barb. 626, 627; Livingston v. Harris (N. Y.) 11 Wend. 329, 343. CONTRA, see Vilas v. Jones, 1 N. Y. 274, 279.

Both the principal debtor and his surety are borrowers, within an act relating to usury. Perrine v. Striker (N. Y.) 7 Page, 598, 602.

Subsequent mortgagee.

A mortgagee of real estate subject to a lien of a prior judgment confessed by the mortgagor upon usurious consideration is not a borrower, within the meaning of the statute relating to usury. Rexford v. Widger, 2 N. Y. (2 Comst.) 131; Rexford v. Widger (N. Y.) 3 Barb. Ch. 640, 641.

BOSS.

"Boss" originally meant master, in the sense of owner or proprietor. Grueber v. Lindenmeier, 42 Minn. 99, 101, 43 N. W. 964, 965.

A "boss" is one who oversees or gives directions. To say that a party acted as boss, is another way of saying he gave directions in reference to the work. Evidence that a party was boss, held a mere statement of facts, and not an expression of an opinion. Applebee v. Albany Brewing Co., 12 N. Y. Supp. 576, 578, 58 Hun, 605.

BOTCH.

A statement in regard to a mason that he is no mechanic, that he cannot make a good wall or do a good job of plastering, that he is no workman, and that he is a botch, are slanderous per se, as imputing want of skill or knowledge. Fitzgerald v. Redfield (N. Y.) 51 Barb. 484, 491.

BOTH.

An entry of land, reciting that S. enters 3,000 acres of land on the south fork of a certain creek, including "both the bottoms below the road," means the two bottoms upon the stream next to the road. Coleman's Heirs v. Kenton, 28 Ky. (5 J. J. Marsh.) 44, 45.

The general incorporation act, art. 9, § 1, authorizing cities and villages to make local improvements by "special assessment or by special taxation or both" of contiguous property, does not mean that the two diverse and distinct systems may be combined in a single improvement, but that the improvement may be made in both ways by each of the methods. In this sense the words "or both" appropriately occur immediately following the special method which may be pursued, and add perspicuity to the section. Kuehner v. City of Freeport, 32 N. E. 372, 375, 143 Ill. 92, 17 L. R. A. 774.

As either.

A joint deed reserving the use and control of the premises conveyed so long as they both shall live will be construed to mean so long as either of them shall live. Bank of Greenbrier v. Edgingham, 41 S. E. 143, 51 W. Va. 267.

The term "either" does not include "both," nor does "both," the greater, intend and therefore include the less, "either." Martin v. Mahoa, 4 Hawaiian, 427, 429.

As including.

Where the testator made a full disposition of his property, directing that the interest of his real and personal estate be applied by his wife for the benefit of herself and children, and, on her second marriage or death, deprived her of all power and benefit under the will, and added a subsequent clause directing that his executors shall order all his property, "both" freehold and leasehold, to be sold, the word "both" should be construed as if the testator had said "including." Lachlan v. Reynolds, 9 Hare, 796, 799.

BOTTLE.

An indictment alleging a larceny of a number of bottles of whisky means bottles containing whisky, and is not a sufficient averment to support proof of larceny of whisky from a barrel, which the thief put into bottles for the purpose of carrying it away. Commonwealth v. Gavin, 121 Mass. 54, 55, 23 Am. Rep. 255.

Demijohn.

A demijohn is not a bottle, within the meaning of the customs law, requiring them to be packed in packages of a dozen each. United States v. Ninety Demijohns of Rum (U. S.) 8 Fed. 485, 487.

In tariff act.

Hollow, translucent vessels, moulded from glass, and etched with fluoric acid, representing female figures, the head separable from the body, and fitting closely on a narrow neck, so as to form a stopper, of a capacity of 7½ and 18½ fluid ounces, respectively, are dutiable as "bottles" under Act Cong. Oct. 1, 1890 (Supp. Rev. St. U. S. [2d Ed.] p. 817) par. 103. Such vessels were therefore not within the term "pressed glassware," dutiable under paragraph 105. In re Smith (U. S.) 55 Fed. 476, 478.

"Bottle glass," as used in Tariff Act March 3, 1883, par. 133, is probably synonymous with the term "bottle glassware," and means glassware of a nature like that of glass bottles, and therefore would, with reasonable clearness, include pickle and preserve jars, which ordinarily have a neck and inside shoulder. United States v. Leggett (U. S.) 66 Fed. 300, 302, 13 C. C. A. 448.

Secondhand bottles, capable of being used as bottles, are assessable as bottles, under paragraph 99, Tariff Act July 24, 1897, c. 11, § 1, Schedule B, 30 Stat. 156 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1633], and not as junk. Carberry v. United States (U. S.) 116 Fed. 773, 774.

BOTTLED GOODS.

"Bottled goods," as the same is used in an ordinance authorizing the granting of licenses for the sale of liquor, means liquors put up and sold in bottles, and does not authorize the licensee to keep and sell beer by the keg, quart, or vessel, though some of the sales may be made in less quantities than a quart. Harris v. People, 28 Pac. 1133, 1 Colo. App. 289.

BOTTOMED.

Title may be bottomed in various ways, and therefore where it appeared that the plaintiff in an action in ejectment was claiming under an application and warrant entered in his name, after apparent abandonment of a settlement on the land in dispute by defendant's ancestor, an instruction that, if plaintiff's title was bottomed on that of defendant's ancestor, limitations would not apply, was too indefinite. For example, the plaintiff may have contracted with the immediate descendants of defendant's ancestor to take out a warrant for their benefit, or he may have entered on the vacant possession with an intent to procure an adverse title for himself, and in these two cases the operation of limitations might have been very different. Smith v. Thompson (Pa.) 2 Serg. & R. 49, 51.

BOTTOMRY.

See "Contract of Bottomry."

Judge Story defines "bottomry" as "a contract for a loan of money on the bottom of a ship, at an extraordinary interest upon maritime risks, to be borne by the lender for the voyage or for a definite period." The Draco (U. S.) 7 Fed. Cas. 1032. The form of an instrument of bottomry varies in different countries. In some it binds the owners personally. In England and the United States it does not do so, and, if the terms rendered them responsible, they would be inoperative. They will only be liable for any funds which may have come to their hands, arising from the ship which was pledged. The Virgin, 33 U. S. (8 Pet.) 538, 8 L. Ed. 1036. The money is at the risk of the lender during the voyage, and the right to demand payment depends on the safe arrival of the vessel. Braynard v. Hoppock, 20 N. Y. Super. Ct. (7 Bosw.) 157, 164 (citing The Mary [U. S.] 16 Fed. Cas. 938).

"Bottomry" is a contract by which a ship or its freightage is hypothecated as security for a loan, which is to be repaid only in case the ship survives a particular risk, voyage, or period. Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 3017; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 4770; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 2130. It is of the essence of a contract of bottomry that the lender run the risk of the voyage, and that both principal and interest be at hazard. It is laid down in 2 Marsh. 739, that a contract of bottomry must be in writing, and must specify the sum loaned, with the stipulated marine interest and the voyage proposed, with the duration of the risk which the lender is to run. To constitute a bottomry where the interest reserved is more than legal interest, it is essential that the money loaned and the interest should be put at risk. If they are payable at all events, or if there is collateral security given for them, which is payable at all events, no matter by what name it is called in the instrument of writing which contains it, it is not bottomry. Jennings v. Insurance Co. (Pa.) 4 Bin. 244, 251, 5 Am. Dec. 404.

It is essential to a bottomry transaction that the money lent should run the hazard of the voyage. The William & Emmeline (U. S.) 29 Fed. Cas. 1288.

Bottomry is a maritime contract by which the keel or bottom of the ship is pledged as security for a loan of money usually made for the purpose of repairing the ship when in a foreign port or fitting it up for a voyage. "A contract of 'bottomry,' which is not only a contract of great sanctity but also of great peculiarity, is not a mere agreement for security. It is neither a sale, a partnership, nor a loan, properly speaking, nor an insurance, nor a compound of different constructions, but is a contract having a specific name and a character peculiar to itself." The creditor in a bottomry bond must look entirely to the security for his payment, for the owners of the ship are not rendered liable personally by a contract of bottomry. The Irma, 13 Fed. Cas. 93, 94. It is where the owner of a ship takes up money to carry on his voyage, and pledges the keel or bottom of the ship as security for repayment, in which case it is understood that, if the ship be lost, the loaner loses his money, but, if it return in safety, then he receives back his principal, and also the premium or interest. It is a contract of hazard. White v. Cole (N. Y.) 24 Wend. 116, 126.

Bottomry is a loan of money on the security of a vessel, which money so loaned is payable only in the event of the safe arrival of the vessel at the port of destination; the lender taking responsibility of the sea risk, and being entitled to charge extraordinary interest. Carrington v. The Anna C. Pratt, 59 U. S. (18 How.) 63, 67, 15 L. Ed. 267; Braynard v. Hoppock, 32 N. Y. 571, 573, 88 Am. Dec. 349; Bray v. Bates, 50 Mass. (9 Metc.) 237, 250; The Dora (U. S.) 34 Fed. 343, 344.

"Bottomries" are defined as securities given for advances to aid in fitting out the ship on whose bottom they are founded. Greely v. Smith (U. S.) 10 Fed. Cas. 1076, 1083 (citing 2 Emerig. Ins. 385; 2 Bl. Comm. 457).

A master's draft is held to be but an abbreviated form of bottomry. Hanschell v. Swan, 51 N. Y. Supp. 42, 44, 23 Misc. Rep. 304.

BOTTOMRY BOND.

A bottomry bond is a contract for a loan of money on the bottom of a ship at an extraordinary interest upon maritime risks, to be returned by the lender, for a voyage or a definite period. The Draco (U. S.) 7 Fed. Cas. 1032, 1039, 1042.

A bottomry bond, properly speaking, is given in a foreign court by the master of a vessel to enable the voyage to be prosecuted. Knight v. The Attila (U. S.) 14 Fed. Cas. 755, 758.

"A bottomry bond is a bond given for a loan of money upon the security of a vessel and its accruing freight, its payment being dependent upon maritime risks to be borne by the lender. The condition of the bond is the safety of the hypothecated vessel. The loan is on condition that, if the vessel hypothecated be lost by the perils of the sea, the lender shall not be repaid. It is for a specific voyage more ordinarily, but sometimes for a specified time, and, as it substitutes the risk of the adventure to the unconditional responsibility of the borrower, the rate of interest is universally, though not of necessity, such as would, without that risk, be usurious. The lender becomes to that amount an insurer. The forms of the bonds vary. They more commonly, with us, I believe, specify the risks assumed, which resemble those of the insurer; but some of the older forms covenant that the bond is to become absolute, with a certain rate of interest, or with a specified premium on the safe completion of the voyage, or the safety of the ship at the expiration of the specified term." Cole v. White, 26 Wend. 511, 515.

A bottomry bond is a bond given to secure the loan of money, and pledging the keel or bottom of the ship as security therefor. There is no element of personal liability connected with a bottomry bond proper, and, if one be otherwise good, it will be void if made by a master where the personal liability of the owner had first been relied on. Greely v. Smith (U. S.) 10 Fed. Cas. 1077, 1082.

"A bottomry bond is an obligation executed generally in a foreign port by the master of a vessel for repayment of advances to supply the necessities of the ship, together with such interest as may be agreed on, which bond creates a lien on the ship, which may be enforced in admiralty in case of her safe arrival at the port of destination, but becomes absolutely void and of no effect in case of her loss before such arrival." The Grapeshot, 76 U. S. (9 Wall.) 129, 135, 19 L. Ed. 651.

A bottomry bond is an obligation in the nature of a mortgage on a vessel to secure necessary moneys or supplies for the continuance of a voyage, which can be procured in no other way, and does not create a personal obligation on the owner till the vessel reaches port. Theo. H. Davies & Co. v. Soelberg, 64 Pac. 540, 542, 24 Wash. 308.

A bottomry bond gives no claim against the shipowner. If it binds him personally, it is not a contract of bottomry. But its validity is not affected by the circumstance that additional security is given for the performance of the bottomry contract. The Sophie Wilhelmine (U. S.) 58 Fed. 890, 893, 7 C. C. A. 569.

As negotiable instrument.

See "Negotiable Instrument."

BOUGHT.

"Bought and paid for," as used in Supp. Rev. St. U. S. (2d Ed.) pp. 897, 898, providing that, when lands are occupied by Indians who have "bought and paid for" the same, they may be leased, etc., means lands that they have acquired the ownership of or right to exclusive possession, either by purchase, exchange, or surrender, and not that there has been an actual sale by the government, and an actual payment by the Indians. Strawberry Valley Cattle Co. v. Chipman, 45 Pac. 348, 349, 13 Utah, 454.

As contract to buy.

In an action for not delivering foreign stock, the declaration alleged that the plaintiff "bargained with the defendant to buy, and then bought, from him, and the defendant then agreed to sell, and then sold, to the plaintiff, certain foreign stock, to wit, 28,000 Spanish Active Stock," etc. Held that the words "bought" and "sold" must be construed with reference to the subject-matter of the contract, and as meaning an agreement to buy and sell, and that a contract for the sale of stock, exchequer bills, and securities of that description, in which the property passes by delivery, differs from a contract for the sale of a specific chattel, inasmuch as a contract for the sale of stock, exchequer bills, etc., would be satisfied by the delivery of any stock or bills of the description bargained for, and consequently the contract for sale cannot mean an actual sale, but only a contract to deliver. Heseltine v. Siggers, 1 Exch. 856, 861.

As orders accepted.

As used in a commission contract authorizing the agents to charge commissions on "all goods bought by houses whose accounts are opened through us," "bought" means all goods for which orders have been accepted by the manufacturer principal, though, in consequence of his inability to supply the goods, they were not ultimately delivered to the buyer; the goods being "bought," within the meaning of the term, when a contract for their purchase is concluded. Lockwood v. Levick, 8 C. B. (N. S.) 603, 608.

As equivalent to purchase.

Assignment Act (Sayles' Civ. St. art. 65) § 9, declares that all property conveyed or transferred by the assignor in contemplation of assignment, with intent to defraud creditors, shall pass to the assignee, notwithstanding the transfer, but if it shall appear that the purchaser of any such property bought the same of the assignor in good faith and for a valuable consideration, and without reason to believe that it was fraudulently transferred, he shall acquire a good title. Held, that the word "bought" was used as equivalent to "purchase" in its enlarged legal sense. Simmons Hardware Co. v. Kaufman, 8 S. W. 283, 286, 77 Tex. 131.

The word "bought," in a warehouse receipt reading "bought at owner's risk of fire," as applied to wheat, where it was the custom to mix the wheat, and return owner's wheat of like quality, though it would, unexplained, import a sale, when taken in connection with the expression "at owner's risk of fire," and in the light of the parol evidence, clearly shows that a sale was not contemplated by the parties. Irons v. Kentner, 51 Iowa, 88, 50 N. W. 73, 33 Am. Rep. 119.

BOUGHT NOTE.

A bought note is a note or memorandum of a sale made by a broker, and given by him to the one whose property is sold. Saladin v. Mitchell, 45 Ill. 79, 83.

The term "bought and sold notes" is used to designate memorandums of sales of merchandise. Keim v. Lindley (N. J.) 30 Atl. 1063, 1070.

BOULEVARD.

The word "boulevard" is thus defined in the Century Dictionary: "Originally a bulwark or rampart of a fortification or fortified town; hence a public walk or street occupying the site of a demolished fortification. The name is now sometimes extended to any street or walk encircling a town, and also a street which is of especial width, is given a park-like appearance by reserving spaces at the sides or center for shade trees, flowers, seats, and the like, and is not used for heavy teaming." Also quoting Worcester, Webster, and the Standard Dictionary. Where the context of a park act does not show a more restricted meaning, a boulevard is included in the word "street." West Chicago Park Com'rs v. Farber, 171 Ill. 146, 160, 49 N. E. 427, 432; Howe v. City of Lowell, 51 N. E. 530, 541, 171 Mass. 575; People v. Green, 52 How. Prac. 440, 445.

BOUND.

See "Held and Firmly Bound."

The word "bound," as used in an instruction that if it appears from the testimony that a certain person, acting for the plaintiffs, so acted and conducted himself that another, representing a certain firm, was "bound" to understand that plaintiffs were simply representing a certain other person, and not themselves, going along and taking no part, except that of agents of such other person, then the set-off is not sustained, etc., means no more than "ought" or "bound in reason." Stewart v. Morris (U. S.) 96 Fed. 703, 704, 37 C. C. A. 562.

As affected or concluded.

A person interested in property against which a mechanic's lien is sought to be established, who is not made a party to the proceeding, is not "bound"—that is, affected—thereby. Russell v. Grant, 122 Mo. 161, 175, 26 S. W. 958, 43 Am. St. Rep. 563.

The word "bound," in a statute providing that parties to a contract not made parties to the suit shall not be bound thereby, is used in a narrow sense—mainly as meaning concluded. Real Estate Investment Co. v. Haseltine, 53 Mo. App. 308.

A charge to the jury that a defendant, not having been a party to the action, was not bound by the judgment therein, was held not to have misled the jury, though the word "estopped" would have been better than "bound." Finch v. Finch, 42 S. E. 615, 616, 131 N. C. 271.

As liable to pay.

A written instrument requesting a bank not to protest any notes on which the defendant was indorser, and that the defendant would consider himself bound in the same manner as if the notes had been legally protested, means that the defendant would pay the debt. Stone v. Bradbury, 14 Me. 185, 193.

An agreement by the indorser of a note to consider himself bound renders him liable to pay the debt, but, to bind him to pay the debt, all the incidents of protest and notice are indispensable, and may well be supposed to have been in the contemplation of the party when entering into the contract. Union Bank v. Hyde, 19 U. S. (6 Wheat.) 572, 574, 5 L. Ed. 333.

An acknowledgment that the maker of an instrument is bound to pay is equivalent to a promise to pay. Milner v. Bainton (Del.) 1 Har. 144.

An acknowledgment that a party is bound to pay is no different from any acknowledgment that he owes and is indebted. Shattuck v. People, 5 Ill. (4 Scam.) 477, 481.

Limit or border synonymous.

"Bound" is synonymous with "limit" or "border." Barney v. Dayton, 8 Ohio Cir. Ct. R. 480, 481.

BOUNDARY.

See "Lost Boundary"; "Natural Boundary."

"Boundary" includes every separation which marks the confines or line of division of two contiguous estates. When boundaries of land are fixed by known and unquestionable monuments, although neither courses nor distances nor the computed contents correspond, the monuments must govern. With respect to courses, from errors in surveying instruments, variation of the needle, and other causes, different surveyors often disagree. The same observations apply to distances, arising from the inaccuracy of measures or of the party measuring, and computations are often erroneous. But fixed monuments remain. About them there is no dispute or uncertainty. What may be uncertain must be governed by monuments, about which there is no dispute." Pernam v. Wead, 6 Mass. 131, 133.

By "boundary" is understood, in general, every separation, natural or artificial, which makes the confines or line of division of two contiguous estates. Trees or hedges may be planted, ditches may be dug, and walls or inclosures may be erected to serve as boundaries. But we most usually understand by "boundaries" stones or pieces of wood inserted in the earth on the confines of two estates. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 826.

Of judicial district.

"Boundary," as used in Const. 1890, § 260, which provides that the boundary of any judicial district in a county cannot be changed, except by a two-thirds vote at an election held for such purpose, means the line drawn in the county whereby the county is divided into judicial districts, and has no reference to the boundaries of the county. Linsley v. Coahoma County Sup'rs, 11 South. 336, 337, 69 Miss. 815.

On river.

A "boundary on a river" implies a boundary changing as the shore line changes, either by accretion or erosion. Stockley v. Clisna (U. S.) 119 Fed. 812, 822, 56 C. C. A. 324 (citing City of St. Louis v. Rutz, 138 U. S. 226, 11 Sup. Ct. 337, 34 L. Ed. 941; Nebraska v. Iowa, 143 U. S. 359, 12 Sup. Ct. 396, 36 L. Ed. 186).

BOUNDARY CASE.

Where the matter in controversy is the true location of the line dividing the north half from the south half of certain lots, the action is a boundary case, so that the decision of the Court of Civil Appeals thereon is final. Wright v. Bell, 63 S. W. 623, 94 Tex. 577.

Where the rights of parties to an action involving the title to land depend solely on location, which must be determined by the boundaries of different tracts of land, then we have what the law designates as a "case of boundary." Such a case arose where the dispute was as to whether the boundary lines of two claims were contiguous, so as to leave no vacant land between subject to location by plaintiffs. Schley v. Blum, 22 S. W. 667, 668, 85 Tex. 551.

"Boundary" is a word having no technical signification. A precise definition of the words "all cases of boundary," as used in Rev. St. 1895, art. 996, providing that the judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals shall be conclusive in all cases of boundary, is difficult. Broadly stated, every action for the recovery of land, and in which a question of the true location of any line of a survey may become involved, is a boundary case. The words admit of that construction. On the other hand, a narrow limitation of the scope of the terms would restrict their meaning to cases brought by one owner of a tract of land against the owner of a contiguous survey to determine one or more of the boundary lines between them. Every action to try title to land may involve a question of boundary, but this does not of itself make a boundary case. It was held, in effect, in Schley v. Blum, 85 Tex. 551, 22 S. W. 667, that the right of the case must depend upon a question of boundary, and it may be added that the right of the whole case must so depend. Cox v. Finks, 43 S. W. 1, 91 Tex. 318.

The Supreme Court of Texas is by statute denied jurisdiction over boundary cases. As to what constitutes a boundary case, the court held that, in order to be a boundary case, the right of the whole case must depend upon a question of boundary, and the question of whether or not it is a boundary case depends upon the answer to the question, if there had been no question of boundary, would there have been a case? If so, it is not a boundary case. If not, it is a case of boundary, pure and simple. It was ruled that the statute did not exclude the jurisdiction of the court over an action on notes given for the purchase price of land, and to foreclose a vendor's lien thereon, in which defendants deny that plaintiffs had title to the land sold, and in which the sole issue of fact is the location of a certain boundary. Steward v. Coleman County, 67 S. W. 1016, 95 Tex. 445.

BOUNDING.

The words "bounding and abutting," in Rev. St. § 2264, providing that, when a special municipal assessment is by the front foot, it shall be on the property bounding and abutting on the improvement, are not to be so restricted in their application as to exclude property fronting on the side of a street which is widened by the taking of property on the opposite side. City of Cincinnati v. Batsche, 40 N. E. 21, 24, 52 Ohio St. 324.

BOUNDS.

See "Within the Bounds."

A legal and imaginary line by which different parcels of land are divided. Walton v. Tift, 14 Barb. 216, 219.

BOUNTY.

A bounty is a grant of money or lands to persons doing military or naval services for the government. Congress, under the Constitution, has on numbers of times granted land and money to soldiers, which habitually and repeatedly have been called "bounty"—such as "bounty of three months' pay and 160 acres of land," "military bounty lands," "bounty in money and land," "money bounty," "bounty of 160 acres of land," "bounty in land," "bounty right." State of Iowa v. McFarland, 4 Sup. Ct. 210, 216, 110 U. S. 471, 28 L. Ed. 198.

"Bounty" signifies money paid or a premium offered to encourage or promote an object, or procure a peculiar act or thing to be done. Fowler v. Danvers, 90 Mass. (8 Allen) 80, 84. A sum of money or other things given, generally by the government, to certain persons, for some service they have done or are about to do to the public. Abbe v. Allen, 39 How. Prac. 481, 484, 488.

"Bounties" for killing wolves and other animals are a means for the protection of stock raisers, and a law giving bounties is within Const. 1876, art. 16, § 23, providing that the Legislature may pass laws for the protection of stock raisers in the stock-raising portion of the state. Such a statute is not in contravention of a clause of the Constitution forbidding the granting of public money to any individual, as the act in question does not contemplate the granting of public money to any individual, but the individual is to be recompensed for the killing of the wild animals mentioned in the act merely as the means or instrument chosen by the Legislature, within its proper discretion, by which the public calamity wrought by these animals is to be averted. Weaver v. Scurry County (Tex.) 2 S. W. 836.

Acceptance required.

In the term "bounty," as applied to bounties given by statute, there is a consideration implied. So long as the consideration is not rendered, it remains a mere offer or privilege, which may be taken away by the repeal of the statute; but, when earned, by complying with the conditions of the statute, the right to the bounty becomes vested. Ingram v. Colgan, 38 Pac. 315, 317, 106 Cal. 113, 28 L. R. A. 187, 46 Am. St. Rep. 221 (citing East Saginaw Mfg. Co. v. City of East Saginaw, 19 Mich. 259, 2 Am. Rep. 82; East Saginaw Salt Mfg. Co. v. Same, 80 U. S. [13 Wall.] 373, 20 L. Ed. 611; People v. State Auditors, 9 Mich. 327).

"A bounty law is not a contract, except to bestow the promised bounty on those who earn it, so long as it is not repealed. There is no pledge that it shall not be repealed at any time. There is no obligation on the part of any person to comply with the conditions of such a law. It is a matter purely voluntary, and, as it is purely voluntary on one part, so it is purely voluntary on the other part; that is, on the part of the Legislature to continue or not to continue the law." East Saginaw Salt Mfg. Co. v. East Saginaw, 80 U. S. (13 Wall.) 373, 376, 377, 20 L. Ed. 611.

Under St. Mo. 1863, p. 39, authorizing counties to pay bounties to volunteers enlisting in the military service, a county which offered bounties to parties volunteering to fill the quota, in effect, entered into a contract with the parties volunteering, which contract could be enforced by action. State ex rel. Bohannon v. Howard County Court, 39 Mo. 375, 377.

As extra compensation.

"Bounty" is defined by Bouvier to be "an additional benefit conferred upon, or a compensation paid to, a class of persons." It differs from a reward, which is usually applied to a sum paid for the performance of some specific act of some person or persons. Bounty warrants and bounty lands were a premium offered and given to induce men to enlist in the public service, as extra compensation offered by the government to those who should enlist and faithfully discharge the duties of a soldier. Kircher v. Murray (U. S.) 54 Fed. 617, 624.

As gift or gratuity or compensation.

The word "bounty," ex vi termini, implies a gratuity, not compensation; an inducement to enlist. Eichelberger v. Sifford, 27 Md. 320, 330. It means a gift, and negatives the idea of a consideration, in the legal sense of the word. Fowler v. Danvers, 90 Mass. (8 Allen) 80, 81.

The term "bounty," used in a law providing for payments to persons enlisting in the military service, would ordinarily imply that the money so raised was to be used as an inducement to enter the service, and not as a gratuity or acknowledgment for services already rendered. Kidder v. Selectmen of Stewartstown, 48 N. H. 290, 292.

The term "bounty," as used in reference to bounties given by statute, implies a consideration. Ingram v. Colgan, 38 Pac. 315, 317, 106 Cal. 113, 28 L. R. A. 187, 46 Am. St. Rep. 221.

"According to the more common usage of the language, 'bounty' means money paid or a premium offered to encourage or promote an object, or procure a particular act or thing to be done. As used in statutes relative to the enlistment of soldiers, it means a payment made to procure or induce soldiers to enlist, as distinguished from a reward or gratuity to those already in the service." Fowler v. Selectmen of Danvers, 90 Mass. (8 Allen) 80, 84.

Grant distinguished.

"The word 'bounty,' in its ordinary signification, may be defined to be an additional benefit conferred upon, or a compensation paid to, a class of persons. 1 Bouv. Law Dict. (Ed. 1897) p. 260. It is important to observe that section 5 of the tariff act of 1897, providing that whenever any country shall pay or bestow, directly or indirectly, any bounty or grant upon the exportation of any article or merchandise from such country, an additional duty shall be collected, etc., does not use the word 'bounty' in any narrow or technical sense. It embraces any bounty or grant bestowed or conferred by the government, whether directly or indirectly. The word 'grant' is more comprehensive in meaning than the word 'bounty.' It implies the conferring by the sovereign power of some valuable privilege, franchise, or other right of like character, upon a corporation, person, or class of persons." Downs v. United States (U. S.) 113 Fed. 144, 147, 51 C. C. A. 100.

Reward distinguished.

A reward is not the same thing as a bounty, but the term "reward" is usually applied to a sum paid for the performance of some specific act to some person or persons. Kircher v. Murray (U. S.) 54 Fed. 617, 624.

The terms "bounty" and "reward" are nearly allied in meaning, the distinction being the former is said to be the appropriate term where the services or action of many persons are desired, and each who acts upon the offer may entitle himself to the promised gratuity without prejudice from or to the claims of others, while a reward applies to the case of a single service, which can be only once performed, and therefore will be earned only by the person or co-operating persons who succeed while others fail. A primary meaning of "bounty" is goodness, kindness, virtue, worth; (2) liberality in bestowing gifts or favors, gracious or liberal giving, generosity, munificence; (3) a premium offered or given to induce men to enlist in the public service, or to encourage any branch of industry, as husbandry or manufactures. Ingram v. Colgan, 38 Pac. 315, 317, 106 Cal. 113, 28 L. R. A. 187, 46 Am. St. Rep. 221 (citing Webst. Dict.).

"Bounty," as used in the tariff act of 1890, providing that on and after a specified date there shall be paid, from moneys in the treasury not otherwise appropriated, a sugar bounty, of a certain amount, is not a gratuity or donation by the government, but was intended to be, and is in fact, a standing offer of reward and compensation to sugar producers, to encourage and stimulate them in the otherwise losing business of producing sugar in the United States. It was intended to be, and is in fact, a guaranty of reimbursement to sugar producers accepting the terms of the statute of part, at least, of the cost of production. A claim for such bounty earned by raising sugar is a vested right, constituting property. Calder v. Henderson (U. S.) 54 Fed. 802, 804, 4 C. C. A. 584.

BOWIE KNIFE.

A "bowie knife" or "dagger," as the terms are used in the Penal Code, means any knife intended to be worn on the person, which is capable of inflicting death, and not commonly known as a "pocketknife." Pen. Code Tex. 1895, art. 606.

BOWLING.

Bowling is not an offense within St. 17 Geo. 2, c. 5, § 2, describing the offenses of idle and disorderly persons, rogues, and vagabonds. One convicted of playing at bowls is not a disorderly person, within the meaning of the act. Rex v. Clark, 1 Cowp. 35, 36.

BOWLING ALLEY.

Every building or space where bowls are thrown, or where games of billiards or pool are played, and that are open to the public, with or without price, shall be regarded as a bowling alley or billiard room, respectively, within the meaning of the war revenue act of 1898. U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 2288.

BOX.

See "Axle Box."

A "box," within the meaning of a receipt given by a common carrier providing that the company shall not be liable for any loss or damage to any box, package, or thing, for over $50, means each separate box, although a number of such separate boxes are included in one receipt. Boscowitz v. Adams Exp. Co., 93 Ill. 523, 524, 34 Am. Rep. 191.

Barrel.

"Box," as used in a statute relative to the drawing of jurors, which require their names to be put on cards and drawn from a box, will be construed to include a barrel. Commonwealth v. Bacon, 135 Mass. 521, 525.

BOX BOARD.

A box board is used to make boxes, or for sheathing a house. Sloan v. Allegheny Co., 46 Atl. 1003, 1004, 91 Md. 501.

BOX CAR.

A box car is an inclosed and covered freight car, and a freight car is a railroad car for carrying freight, so that a box car is a rail or railroad car; and hence an information charging one with burglary from a box car complies with a statute making it burglary to enter a rail car with intent to steal. State v. Green, 39 Pac. 322, 15 Mont. 424.

BOY.

A "boy" is defined by Webster to be a male child, and generally applies to males under 10 or 12 years of age; and hence where, on an indictment for larceny, the record shows that a boy drew the grand jury, it will be presumed that he was a child under 10, as required by Code, § 4015. Zachary v. State, 66 Tenn. (7 Baxt.) 1, 3.

In a statute providing a penalty for an assault on a child, the word, when applied to a boy, means a male child under the age of 14. Bell v. State, 18 Tex. App. 53, 56, 51 Am. Rep. 293.

A will, by a testator having four minor sons and three adult sons, devising certain property to the "four boys," will be construed to mean the four minor sons of testator. Bradley v. Rees, 113 Ill. 327, 332, 55 Am. Rep. 422.

BOYCOTT.

As conspiracy, see "Conspiracy."

"The word 'boycotting' is not easily defined. It is frequently spoken of as passive, merely; a let-alone policy; a withdrawal of all business relations, intercourse, and fellowship. We may gather some of its real meaning by reference to the circumstances in which the word originated. These circumstances are thus narrated by Mr. Justin H. MacCarthy, an Irish gentleman of learning and ability, who will be recognized as good authority. In his work entitled 'England under Gladstone,' he says the strike was supported by a form of action, or rather inaction, which soon become historical. Captain Boycott was an Englishman, and agent of Lord Earne, and a farmer in Lough Mask, in the wild and beautiful district of Connemara. In his capacity as agent, he had served notices upon Lord Earne's tenants, and the tenantry suddenly retaliated in the most unexpected way—by, in the language of schools and society, sending Captain Boycott to Coventry in a very thorough manner. The population of the region for miles around resolved not to have anything to do with him, and, as far as they could prevent it, not to allow any one else to have anything to do with him. His life appeared to be in danger. He had to claim police protection. His servants fled from him as servants flee from their masters in some plague-stricken Italian city. The awful sentence of excommunication could hardly have rendered him more helplessly alone for a time. No one would work for him. No one would supply him with food. He and his wife had to work in their own fields themselves, in most unpleasant imitation of Theocritean shepherds and shepherdesses, and play out their grim eclogue in their deserted fields, with the shadows of armed constabulary ever at their heels. The Orangemen of the North heard of Captain Boycott and his sufferings, and the way in which he was holding his ground, and they organized assistance, and sent him down armed laborers from Ulster. To prevent civil war, the authorities had to send a force of soldiers to Lough Mask, and Captain Boycott's harvests were brought in and his potatoes dug by the armed Ulster laborers, guarded always by the little army. If this is a correct picture, the thing we call a boycott originally signified violence, if not murder." State v. Glidden, 8 Atl. 890, 896, 55 Conn. 46, 3 Am. St. Rep. 23.

"The essential idea of boycotting is a confederation, generally secret, of many persons, whose intent is to injure another by preventing any and all persons doing business with him, through fear of incurring the displeasure, prosecution, and vengeance of the conspirators." In re Crump, 6 S. E. 620, 627, 84 Va. 927, 10 Am. St. Rep. 895.

The term "boycott" has acquired a significance in the vocabulary of the court and the literature of the law, and it implies a combination to inaugurate and maintain a general proscription of articles manufactured by the party against whom it is directed. Oxley Stave Co. v. Coopers' International Union (U. S.) 72 Fed. 695, 699.

A boycott is an organized effort to exclude a person from business relations with others, by persuasion, intimidation, and other acts which tend to violence, and thereby force him, from fear of resulting injury, to submit to dictation in the management of his affairs. Casey v. Cincinnati Typographical Union No. 3 (U. S.) 45 Fed. 135, 143, 12 L. R. A. 193.

"Boycott" is defined as a combination between persons to suspend or discontinue dealings or patronage with another person or persons because of refusal to comply with a request of him or them. The purpose is to constrain acquiescence or to force submission on the part of the individual who, by non-compliance with the demand, has rendered himself obnoxious to the immediate parties, and perhaps to their personal and fraternal associates. Anderson's Law Dictionary. In Brace v. Evans, 3 Ry. & Corp. Law J. 561, it is stated: "The word in itself implies a threat. In popular acceptance, it is an organized effort to exclude a person from business relations with others by persuasion, intimidation, and other acts which tend to violence; and they coerce him, through fear of his own injury, to submit to dictation in the management of his affairs." The term therefore comes within the statutory definition of "unlawful conspiracy," and will be enjoined. Matthews v. Shankland, 56 N. Y. Supp. 123, 128, 25 Misc. Rep. 604; Barr v. Essex Trades Council, 30 Atl. 881, 888, 53 N. J. Eq. (8 Dick.) 101.

The word "boycott" is usually understood as a combination of many to cause loss to one person by coercing others, against their will, to withhold from him their beneficial business intercourse, through threats that, unless the others do so, the many will cause similar loss to them. Toledo, A. A. & N. M. R. Co. v. Pennsylvania Co. (U. S.) 54 Fed. 730, 736, 19 L. R. A. 387; Beck v. Railway Teamsters' Protective Union, 77 N. W. 13, 24, 118 Mich. 497, 42 L. R. A. 407, 74 Am. St. Rep. 421; Barr v. Essex Trades Council, 53 N. J. Eq. 101, 121, 30 Atl. 881, 888; Brace Bros. v. Evans, 5 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 163, 171.

Though the word "boycott," as it first came into use in connection with the treatment which the tenants of Capt. Boycott extended to their landlord, embodied the notion of combination, yet it quickly and generally came to have a more enlarged sense; and the common colloquial use of the word at present is that of injurious discrimination, without any special agreement or understanding on the part of those who discriminate. Hence it is held that the word "boycott" does not necessarily involve the idea of combination, so that where a plaintiff in an action for slander alleged special damage, in that he had been specially injured in his business as a trader by persons boycotting his store on account of the slander charged, the word "boycotting" did not require plaintiff to prove a combination to injure, but under the allegation of special damage he was entitled to recover on showing a refusal to trade on the part of the old customers on account of defendant's slander, whether such refusal was with or without combination. Davis v. Starrett, 55 Atl. 516, 518, 97 Me. 568.

A boycott is an illegal conspiracy in restraint of trade. Walsh v. Association of Master Plumbers, 71 S. W. 455, 459, 97 Mo. App. 280 (citing Casey v. Cincinnati Typographical Union, No. 3 [U. S.] 45 Fed. 135, 12 L. R. A. 193).

A "boycott" means a refusal to sell to or to do business with the concern, and preventing anybody else from doing business with it on any conditions. John D. Park & Sons Co. v. National Wholesale Druggists' Ass'n, 67 N. E. 136, 139, 175 N. Y. 1, 62 L. R. A. 632, 96 Am. St. Rep. 578.

Strike distinguished.

The distinction between a boycott and an ordinary lawful and peaceable strike, entered upon to obtain concessions in the terms of the strikers' employment, is not a fanciful one, or one which needs the power of fine distinction to determine which is which. A combination by employes of railway companies to injure the owner of cars operated by the companies in his business, by compelling such companies to cease using the cars by threats of quitting their service, thereby inflicting on them great injury, where the relation between him and the companies is mutually profitable, and has no effect whatever on the character or reward of the services of the employed so combining, is a boycott. Thomas v. Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. Ry. Co. (U. S.) 62 Fed. 803, 818.

BRACE.

According to the Seaman's Manual, to brace in the yards of a sailing vessel is to lay them nearly square, as used in the definition of a vessel running free, as being when she has a fair wind, when her yards are braced in. The Queen Elizabeth (U. S.) 100 Fed. 874, 876.

According to the Seaman's Manual, to brace up the yards of a sailing vessel is to lay them more fore than aft. The Queen Elizabeth (U. S.) 100 Fed. 874, 876.

BRACK.

A complaint charged that the defendant answered an inquiry to the plaintiff in figures, words, signs, and abbreviations as follows: "Gentlemen: Could you furnish the following: 40 Brack 3x5, 3 Mem.; 36 Brack 12x8, 3 Mem.? At what price, and how soon?" The complaint averred that, by the usages and customs of the business of manufacturing, buying, and selling dressed lumber and brackets, the abbreviation "brack" is intended to, and does, mean bracket; that the character "x" is a substitute for and means "by"; and that the abbreviation "mem." stands for the word "member." Held, that the terms in the complaint were per se intelligible in themselves, and hence plaintiff properly alleged their meaning in the trade and business in which they were used, and he was entitled to prove such meaning by parol at the trial. Jaqua v. Witham & A. Co., 106 Ind. 545, 547, 548, 7 N. E. 314.

BRACKETS.

The ordinary use of "brackets" is to inclose a parenthesis, which is defined by lexicographers to be "a sentence so inclosed in another sentence as that it may be taken out without injuring the sense of that which incloses it"; and where, under the name of the signer of a note, there is inclosed in brackets the words "for H. E.," it means that, as between the promisor and H. E., the latter was the real debtor. Early v. Wilkinson (Va.) 9 Grat. 68, 72.

BRAID.

Braids of cotton and india rubber are dutiable under Tariff Act July 24, 1897, c. 11, § 1, Schedule J, par. 339, 30 Stat. 180 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1662], as braids composed wholly or in chief value of cotton or other vegetable fiber, not elsewhere specially provided for. Calhoun v. United States (U. S.) 122 Fed. 894.

BRAKEMAN.

A brakeman is a man whose business it is to manage the brake on railways, and the duty to expel trespassers from a freight train cannot be implied merely from the fact that he is in the service of the company in that capacity. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. v. Anderson, 25 S. E. 947, 948, 93 Va. 650.

Extra conductor distinguished.

The term "extra conductor" is more comprehensive than that of "brakeman." The former includes within its distinction such persons as may be engaged as brakemen, whereas the latter does not include the former. In other words, all extra conductors are in a sense brakemen, but all brakemen are not extra conductors. Standard Life & Accident Ins. Co. v. Koen, 33 S. W. 133, 137, 11 Tex. Civ. App. 273.

BRANCH.

See "Main Branch."

Of legislature.

"Branch," as used in Const. art. 4, § 3, declaring that the legislative power of the state shall be vested in two branches, one being styled the "Senate" and the other the "House of Representatives," means not a part of the Representatives or Senators, but the whole of the constituent members of the respective houses or branches of the Legislature. Green v. Weller, 32 Miss. 650, 678.

Of manufacture.

A machine for quarrying and breaking stones for macadamizing roads and similar purposes is not employed in a branch of manufacture, within Pub. St. c. 11, § 20, cl. 12, providing that all personal property shall be assessed to the owner in the city or town where he is an inhabitant on May 1st, except all machinery employed in any branch of manufacture, which shall be assessed where it is situated or employed. Wellington v. Inhabitants of Belmont, 41 N. E. 62, 164 Mass. 142.

Merely sawing logs into boards is not a branch of manufacture. Something more of a transformation of the raw material is necessary to create such sawing a branch of manufacture. Ingram v. Cowles, 23 N. E. 48, 49, 150 Mass. 155.

BRANCH OF THE SEA.

The term "branch of the sea," as used at common law, included rivers in which the tide ebbed and flowed. Arnold v. Mundy, 6 N. J. Law (1 Halst.) 1, 86, 10 Am. Dec. 356.

BRANCH PILOT.

A branch pilot, though appointed by the governor, is not a public officer. His is merely an employment on account of his skill, and the Governor, for the advantage of commerce and to regulate the business, grants a license to pursue the vocation. In pursuance of his employment he exercises none of the sovereign powers of the state, nor is he paid by the state, nor are his duties prescribed by any law of the state. He is merely a navigator—one who is, or ought to be, familiar with taking charge of a ship, and taking it into or out of the port at the particular place where he is engaged in the business. Petterson v. State (Tex.) 58 S. W. 100 (citing United States v. Forbes [U. S.] 25 Fed. Cas. 1141; Dean v. Healy, 66 Ga. 503).

A pilot appointed under Rev. Civ. St. arts. 3796-3810, authorizing the Governor to appoint branch pilots, who shall have the exclusive right to pilot vessels in and out of seaports, is not one of the executive officers of the state enumerated in Const. art. 4, § 1; and hence one who falsely pretended to be a duly appointed pilot was not guilty of a violation of Pen. Code, art. 293, making it an offense to falsely assume to be an executive officer of the state. Petterson v. State (Tex.) 58 S. W. 100.

The duties of a branch pilot are to be performed afloat. The office is aquatic—of a marine character. Its duties are all performed on water, and are not such as to enforce any domicile on land as the situs of performance. State ex rel. Egan v. Follett, 33 La. Ann. 228, 230.

BRANCH RAILROAD.

The charter of a railroad company, authorizing it to build branch roads, will be construed to mean more than side tracks. "It denotes a road connected, indeed, with a main line, but not a mere incident of it—not constructed simply to facilitate the business of the chief railway, but designed to have a business of its own for the transportation of persons or property to and from places not reached by the principal route." State v. United New Jersey R. & Canal Co., 43 N. J. Law (14 Vroom) 110, 111.

Whether a particular portion of a railway is a lateral or branch railroad, or not, does not depend upon its length or direction, but it must be connected with and lead from a main line already constructed, in order to be such; and, where a charter of a railroad company empowers it to construct only one specified branch road, another road, incorporated by the law of a different state, operated by the first road, is not a branch of such road, within a deed reserving a right of way over the granted premises in favor of such road or any of its branches; the word "branches" being taken to mean such branches as the railroad company was or might be legally authorized to construct. Biles v. Tacoma, O. & G. R. Co., 32 Pac. 211, 213, 5 Wash. 509.

As incident to main line.

The usual and ordinary meaning of "branch road," as applied to railroads, denotes, as was said by Mr. Justice Dixon in Akers v. United New Jersey R. & Canal Co., 43 N. J. Law (14 Vroom) 110, 112, a road connected, indeed, with the main line, but not a mere incident of it, or constructed simply to facilitate the business of the chief railway, but designed to have a business of its own for the transportation of persons and property to and from places not reached by the principal route. Grey v. Greenville & H. Ry. Co., 46 Atl. 638, 644, 59 N. J. Eq. 372.

"Branch railroad," as used in a deed of land reserving a strip 400 feet wide on each side of any branch railroad thereafter constructed, is a phrase of such ambiguous import that its meaning cannot be determined without a reference to the circumstances surrounding the parties when they used it. "The phrase is nowhere accurately defined, and although each of the words composing it has a sufficiently exact meaning, the question is unsettled whether the idea expressed by the phrase embraces something more or something less than the word 'railroad' standing by itself—whether, in other words, a branch railroad must be not only a branch of a main line, but must also have all the elements of a separate road, as termini, and freight and passenger traffic between its termini, or whether, being a branch of another road, it need have no distinct termini or traffic of its own." Grennan v. McGregor, 20 Pac. 559, 560, 78 Cal. 258.

A "lateral road" is but another name for a branch road. Both must have a principal road from which they proceed. They are appendages to, and are properly a part of, the main line, and must proceed from some part of the main trunk between its termini. Newhall v. Galena & C. U. R. Co., 14 Ill. (4 Peck) 273, 274.

Extension of main line.

According to Worcester, the word "branch" may mean any distinct article or portion; a section; a subdivision. As used in Act April 1, 1868, authorizing a railroad to construct one or more branches, it will be construed to authorize the railroad to build lines either in continuance from its terminus, or from points along its lines. McAbory v. Pittsburgh & Connellsville R. Co., 15 Pittsb. Leg. J. 268, 271; Appeal of McAbory, 107 Pa. 548, 558.

Where a railroad company is authorized to build its line from a junction with another road to a fixed point, and to extend branch lines into any county that the directors may deem advisable, a road extended from the junction with such other line is a branch road, and not an extension of the main road. Howard County v. Boonville Cent. Nat. Bank, 2 Sup. Ct. 689, 690, 108 U. S. 314, 27 L. Ed. 738.

Under Pub. St. c. 156, § 18, providing that a railroad may build a branch road if it is decided that such road is for the public good, the railroad has a right to construct an extension longer than the existing line, and in effect constituting a new system. In re Laconia St. Ry., 52 Atl. 458, 71 N. H. 355.

Road running in same general direction.

According to Webster, "lateral" means proceeding from the side, as the lateral branches of a tree—lateral shoots—and this is the sense in which this word is to be understood when branch or lateral railroads are spoken of, and a branch or lateral railroad is nothing more than an offshoot from the main line or stem; and the mere fact that a contemplated road runs in the same general direction with the main track will not deprive it of the character of a branch or lateral road, within the meaning of a charter giving the railroad power to construct branch or lateral roads. Blanton v. Richmond, F. & P. R. Co., 10 S. E. 925, 926, 86 Va. 618.

BRAND.

In Pasch. Dig. art. 4659, providing that no brands, except such as are recorded, shall be recognized in law as any evidence of ownership, "brand" does not include marks, and the prohibition is not applicable to marks. Johnson v. State, 1 Tex. App. 333, 345.

Civ. Code, § 2248, makes it the duty of overseers or track menders of railroads to file with the station agents "a list of the different marks and brands of all stock killed upon their respective sections the preceding week." Held, that "brand" indicates some figure or device burned on the animal by a hot iron, a means of identification, and is more commonly used on animals, such as horses, mules, and the like, while others are identified by marks made by knife cuts in the ear, such as cattle, hogs, and the like. Churchill v. Georgia R. & Banking Co., 33 S. E. 972, 973, 108 Ga. 265.

"Brand" means generally to stamp or to mark, and, as used in the statute requiring that every manufacturer of butter shall brand in legible letters on the side of each tablet, etc., his name and the weight of the vessel, means that the name and weight shall be marked on the tub in a distinct manner, as by a stencil plate and chisel, but it is not necessary that they be actually branded into the tubs. Dibble v. Hathaway, 11 Hun, 571, 575.

BRANDON MONEY.

In a promissory note made payable in "Brandon Money," the term "Brandon Money" means currency different from gold or silver. Gift v. Hall, 20 Tenn. (1 Humph.) 480, 484.

BRANDY.

The term "brandy" is a name given to certain spirituous and intoxicating liquors. It is sufficient, in an indictment, to charge the illegal sale of brandy, without stating the kind of brandy—as French brandy, California brandy, etc. State v. Tisdale, 55 N. W. 903, 904, 54 Minn. 105.

Rum, brandy, and gin are different species of spirituous liquors; and the words, in and out of themselves, import them to be spirituous liquors. Thus an indictment charging the sale of rum, brandy, and gin is not defective, in failing to charge that such liquors are spirituous. State v. Munger, 15 Vt. 290, 293.

The words "rum," "brandy," etc., in the statute prohibiting the sale of brandy, rum, etc., or other spirituous liquors, without a license, are not used to constitute a distinct offense or class of offenses, but they are put in the statute by way of instance, so connected with the larger term, "spirituous liquors," as to give efficiency to the rule of construction, ejusdem generis, and qualify these more general words. It is not necessary, in an indictment for the violation of the statute, to charge the particular kind of liquors sold. Commonwealth v. Odlin, 40 Mass. (23 Pick.) 275, 276, 279.

Courts and juries will take knowledge of the fact that whisky and brandy are intoxicating liquors. It needs no evidence to support a fact so well known. State v. Lewis, 90 N. W. 318, 86 Minn. 174.

As long as laws for licensing the sale of intoxicating liquors have existed, brandy, whisky, gin, rum, and other alcoholic liquids have been held to be intoxicating liquors per se, simply because it is within the common knowledge and ordinary understanding that they are intoxicating liquors. Snider v. State, 7 S. E. 631, 632, 81 Ga. 753, 12 Am. St. Rep. 350.

"Brandy" is judicially known to be a spirituous liquor. Pedigo v. Commonwealth, (Ky.) 70 S. W. 659.

BRANDY CHERRIES.

Brandy cherries is a drink or intoxicating liquor, which is bottled, and the bottles partly filled with cherries. The device of so filling the bottles was conceived for the purpose of violating the revenue and intoxicating liquor laws, on the ground that the cherries was the article sold, and not the liquor. The bottles, however, were filled with liquor or distilled spirits consisting of whisky, brandy, or other liquor, which was drunk, and the cherries were not eaten. Hence it was held that the sale of such article was a sale of intoxicating liquors. United States v. Stafford (U. S.) 20 Fed. 720, 722.

"Brandy cherries" preserved in liquor which is intoxicating, and put up in bottles, are within the prohibition of law against the sale of intoxicating liquors. Ryall v. State, 78 Ala. 410.

BRANDY PEACHES.

Brandy peaches contained in a bottle are not intoxicating liquors, within the prohibition of the law. Rabe v. State, 39 Ark. 204.

Where evidence in a prosecution against one charged with unlawfully selling spirituous liquors on Sunday without a prescription shows that the prosecuting witnesses drank from bottles of brandy peaches, and became drunk thereby, it was for the jury to determine whether the liquor was intoxicating. The defendant contended that the liquid was sirup, and not brandy. State v. Scott, 21 S. E. 194, 116 N. C. 1012.

Branded peach preserves is preserved peaches flavored by brandy. "The method of making branded peach preserves is laid down in the standard authorities on the subject of the preservation of food. The fruit, after being properly prepared, is boiled in a sirup made of refined sugar, and is then placed in a bottle, the sirup poured over it, and a sufficient quantity of pure pale brandy to impart to it the desired brandy flavor, just as brandy is used as an ingredient in our pudding sauce or mince pies for the purpose of improving their flavor." United States v. Stafford (U. S.) 20 Fed. 720, 722.

BRASS.

Brass is not found as a native metal. It is an alloy of copper and tin, or copper and zinc. United States v. Ullman (U. S.) 28 Fed. Cas. 323, 326.

The tariff act of March 2, 1861 (12 Stat. 178), imposed a duty of 30 per cent. on manufactures, not otherwise provided for, of brass, copper, or other metal, "or of which either of these metals, or any other metal, shall be the component material of chief value." The tariff act of February 24, 1869 (15 Stat. 274), imposed a duty of 45 per cent. on "all manufactures of copper, or of which copper shall be a component of chief value, not otherwise herein provided for." Held, that under the tariff acts brass must be taken to be a metal as well as copper, and that if "Dutch metal" was a manufacture of brass, although copper was the chief component of brass, yet "Dutch metal" would not be included in the act of 1869 as being a manufacture of which copper was the component of chief value. United States v. Ullman (U. S.) 28 Fed. Cas. 323.

Old cannon composed of 91.09 per cent. copper and 7.05 per cent. tin, though practically worthless for use against modern implements of war, are not free from duty as brass, but dutiable as manufactures of metal. Downing v. United States (U. S.) 116 Fed. 779.

BRASS BUTTONS.

"Brass buttons," as used in a statute providing a duty thereon, means such buttons as are known in trade and commerce as brass buttons, and hence evidence is admissible to show what buttons are included within the term. Erhardt v. Ullman (U. S.) 51 Fed. 414, 416, 2 C. C. A. 319.

BRASS FITTING.

A "fitting" has been defined to be anything used in fitting up, specially in the plural, necessary fittings or apparatus; as the fittings of a church or study. It has also been defined as anything employed in fitting up, permanently used, generally in the plural, in the sense of fixtures, tackle, apparatus, equipment. Hence the term as used in an indictment charging a theft of a "certain lot of brass fittings," is too indefinite to identify the articles alleged to have been stolen. Brown v. State, 42 S. E. 795, 116 Ga. 559.

BRASS KNUCKLES OR KNUCKS.

"Brass knuckles" as used in a statute prohibiting the carrying of brass knuckles, include knuckles made of steel, which are similar in shape, size, use, etc., to brass knuckles. "Brass knuckles" is the name of the weapon, and is not intended to designate the materials of which it is made. Harris v. State, 3 S. W. 477, 478, 22 Tex. App. 679.

An indictment charging the carrying of "brass knuckles" does not necessarily mean that the knuckles must be made of a metal known as "brass," but includes knuckles made out of any hard metal. Morrison v. State, 43 S. W. 113, 38 Tex. Cr. R. 392; Harris v. State, 3 S. W. 477, 478, 22 Tex. App. 677; Louis v. State, 35 S. W. 377, 378, 36 Tex. Cr. R. 52, 61 Am. St. Rep. 832.

"Brass knucks," as used in the statute, means "knucks" that are made of brass or other metal. It is the weapon, and not the metal, which is condemned by the law. Patterson v. State, 71 Tenn. (3 Lea) 575.

BRAWL.

Rev. St. c. 113, declares that no person shall make any "brawl or tumult" in a street, lane, alley, or public place. Held, that the Legislature intended to provide a punishment for one offense, "brawl" and "tumult" being relative terms, the one employed to express the meaning of the other. State v. Perkins, 42 N. H. 464, 465.

BRAWLER.

See "Common Brawler."

BREAD.

Bread "is an article sold for immediate consumption, and never enters into commerce, and, as one of the prime necessities of life, is of no use unless it is good to eat"; hence, in a sale to a middleman, there is an implied warranty that the bread is good to eat. Sinclair v. Hathaway, 23 N. W. 459, 460, 57 Mich. 60, 58 Am. Rep. 327.

BREACH.

The breaking or violating of a law right or duty, either by commission or omission; the violation or nonfulfillment of an obligation, contract, or duty. Black, Law Dict.

BREACH OF CONTRACT.

A "breach of contract" is a commission of some act, or the omission of an act, specified or implied in contract. This commission or omission is not just or unjust, inequitable or equitable, for the law does not look for those qualities in adjudicating on a contract, but simply at the contract and its terms. If, however, the words are to be taken in a moral sense, then the offense would be doing something in connection with a breach of contract that was morally unjust and inequitable. People v. New York Produce Exchange, 29 N. Y. Supp. 307, 308, 8 Misc. Rep. 552.

A renunciation does not create a "breach" of a contract. There must be an adoption of the renunciation. Wells v. Hartford Manilla Co., 55 Atl. 599, 602, 76 Conn. 27.

BREACH OF GOOD BEHAVIOR.

See "Good Behavior."

BREACH OF THE LAW.

A life insurance policy provided that it should be void in case death was caused by duelling, fighting, or other "breach of the law." The assured was driving a sulky in a horse race, which was made illegal by statute, and, on a collision ensuing, jumped to the ground from his sulky, and was clear from the sulky and uninjured, and then started forward to get hold of the reins, which were hanging across the axletree, and in attempting to get hold of them, or after grasping them, was killed by getting tangled in them, falling down and being dragged against a stone. Held, that the leap from the sulky, and securing the reins, and the subsequent fall and injury, were so close and immediate in their relation to the racing, and all so manifestly a part of the illegal transaction, that it could not be said that there was a new and controlling influence to which the disaster could be attributed, but that the accident occurred and was caused by a "breach of the law." Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Seaver, 86 U. S. (19 Wall.) 531, 532, 22 L. Ed. 155.

BREACH OF THE PEACE.

The term "breach of the peace" is a generic term, which includes riotous and unlawful assemblies and affrays, forcible entry and detainer, wanton discharge of firearms in public streets, or so near the chamber of a sick person that it will cause injury, the sending of challenges to a duel, provoking a fight, the going armed in public, without lawful occasion, in such a manner as to alarm the public, and many other acts of a similar character. People v. Bartz, 19 N. W. 161, 53 Mich. 493.

"Breach of the peace" is a breach of the tranquility enjoyed by the citizens of a municipality or community where good order reigns among its members, and which is the right of all persons in political society, and any intentional violation of that right is a breach of the peace. Actual personal violence is not an essential element of the offense, but any wicked language and conduct of a guilty party, destructive of the peace of the citizens and of good morals, is sufficient to establish such offense. People v. Rounds, 35 N. W. 77, 79, 67 Mich. 482. See, also, Davis v. Burgess, 20 N. W. 540, 542, 54 Mich. 514, 52 Am. Rep. 828.

The term "breach of the peace" is generic, and includes unlawful assemblies, riots, affrays, provoking a fight, and other acts of similar character. The use of grossly indecent, profane, and abusive language toward another person upon the highway, in the presence of others, is a breach of the peace. Any violation of public order or decorum is a breach of the peace. In Davis v. Burgess, 54 Mich. 514, 20 N. W. 540, 52 Am. Rep. 828, the court said: "By 'peace,' as used in this connection, is meant the tranquility enjoyed by the citizens of a municipality or community where good order reigns among its members. This is the natural right of all persons in political societies, and any violation of that right is a breach of the peace. Actual personal violence is not an essential element of the offense. If it were, communities might be kept in a constant state of turmoil, fear, and anticipated danger from the wicked language and conduct of a guilty party, not only destructive of the peace of citizens, but of public morals, without the commission of the offense." Blackstone says, besides the actual breach of the peace, anything that tends to provoke or excite others to break it is an offense of the same denomination. Thus, where parties attempted to go through a gate which blocked a public way and was a nuisance they were guilty of a breach of the peace in provoking a fight while so doing. State v. White, 28 Atl. 968, 970, 18 R. I. 473.

A breach of the peace is an offense well known to the common law. It is a disturbance of public order by an act of violence, or by any act likely to produce violence, or which, by causing consternation and alarm, disturbs the peace and quiet of the community. People v. Wallace, 83 N. Y. Supp. 130, 133, 85 App. Div. 170.

A breach of the peace is a violation of public order; the offense of disturbing the public peace. An act of public indecorum is also a breach of the peace. The term is generic, and includes unlawful assemblies. Games of baseball upon Sunday are breaches of the peace. Scougale v. Sweet, 82 N. W. 1061, 1064, 124 Mich. 311 (citing Ex parte Carroll, 12 Wkly. Law Bul. 9).

An indictment charging a breach of the public peace by quarreling, sufficiently charges such offense. State v. Archibald, 9 Atl. 362, 364, 59 Vt. 548, 59 Am. Rep. 755.

BREACH OF TRUST.

A breach of trust is a wrong, and a constructive fraud arises upon the said breach of trust. A trustee cannot take advantage of his own wrong by setting up his own breach of trust. Kerr v. Blodgett (N. Y.) 16 Abb. Prac. 137, 145.

BREACH OF WARRANTY.

Marshall on Insurance says that: "A breach of warranty consists either in the falsehood of an affirmative, or in the non-performance of an executory stipulation;" and he adds "that in either case the contract is void ab initio, the warranty being a condition precedent." Hendricks v. Commercial Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 8 Johns. 1, 13.

A breach of warranty in insurance is equally fatal whether the thing warranted be material or immaterial, or was or was not intended, or was or was not the fault of insured. Fitzgerald v. Supreme Council of Catholic Mut. Ben. Ass'n, 39 N. Y. App. Div. 251, 257, 56 N. Y. Supp. 1005, 1007.

To constitute a breach of covenant of quiet enjoyment and warranty, there must be a disturbance in and deprivation or cessation of the possession by the prosecution and operation of legal measures. Stewart v. Drake, 9 N. J. Law (4 Halst.) 139.

BREAK.

See "Breaking (In Criminal Law)."

See "Broken."

BREAK OUT.

As used in 7 & 8 Geo. IV, relating to burglaries, the words "break out" were not satisfied by an indictment for burglary stating in one count that the person "did break to get out," and in another that he "did break and get out." Rex v. Compton, 7 Car. & P. 139.

BREAKAGE.

"Breakage," as used in a bill of lading which exempts the carrier from liability for loss occasioned by breakage, would not exempt the carrier from liability for breakage occasioned by his own gross negligence. Reno v. Hogan, 51 Ky. (12 B. Mon.) 63, 64, 54 Am. Dec. 513.

BREAKER.

The term "breaker," as used in the act relating to mines and mining, means the structure containing the machinery used for the preparation of coal. P. & L. Dig. Laws Pa. 1894, vol. 2, col. 3110, § 193; Commonwealth v. Smith (Pa.) 4 C. P. Rep. 1, 4. We cannot understand how the structure in which the coal in a washery is prepared can be denied the title "breaker." Whatever coal a washery finds it necessary to break, is broken therein, as well as washed, and it seems but reasonable to conclude that the structure of a washery is included in the expression "any coal breaker or other structure." Commonwealth v. Brookwood Coal Co., 25 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 55, 57.

BREAKING.

A bill of lading, signed by the shipper of live stock and a railroad company, released the defendant railroad company from damage or loss from "breaking," chafing, weather, fire, or water. Held, that the word "breaking" was applicable only to goods and merchandise, and hence there was no exemption from liability for the breaking of a leg of an animal. Coupland v. Housatonic R. Co., 23 Atl. 870, 871, 61 Conn. 531, 15 L. R. A. 534.

BREAKING (In Criminal Law).

See "House Breaking."

The word "break," as used in the Penal Code, means and includes (1) breaking or violently detaching any part, internal or external, of a building; or (2) opening for the purpose of entering therein, by any means whatever, any outer door of a building, or of any apartment or set of apartments therein, separately used or occupied, or any window, shutter, scuttle, or other thing used for covering or closing an opening thereto or therein, or which gives passage from one part thereof to another; or (3) obtaining an entrance into such a building or apartment by any threat or artifice used for that purpose, or by collusion with any person therein; (4) entering such a building or apartment by or through any pipe, chimney, or other opening, or by excavating, digging or breaking through or under the building, or the walls or foundation thereof. Gen. St. Minn. 1894, § 6680; Pen. Code N. Y. 1903, § 499.

Actual breaking.

"Actual breaking," as applied to burglary, means the making of an opening or mode of entrance into a building by force. Minter v. State (Ark.) 71 S. W. 944, 945.

"Actual breaking," as used in Pen. Code, art. 714, providing that an entry into a house for the purpose of committing theft, unless the same is effected by "actual breaking," is not burglary where the same is done by a domestic servant, does not include an entry into a house by opening a door which was closed and bolted but not locked. Waterhouse v. State, 2 S. W. 889, 21 Tex. App. 663.

The "breaking" necessary to constitute burglary with intent to commit rape may be actual or constructive, as where the entrance is obtained by fraud, threats, or conspiracy. An actual breaking may be proved by evidence of very slight force, such as lifting the latch of a door, breaking a window, breaking the lock, or other like acts, and also by evidence of escaping from the house by any of these or like means. State v. Fisher (Del.) 41 Atl. 208, 211, 1 Pennewill, 303.

To constitute the offense, the breaking may be either actual or constructive; actual where the offender, for the purpose of getting admission for any part of his body, or for a weapon or other instrument, in order to effect his felonious intention, breaks a hole in the wall of the house, breaks a door or window, or picks the lock of a door, or opens it with a key, or even by lifting the latch or unloosening any other fastening to doors or windows the owner has provided. Sims v. State, 136 Ind. 358, 36 N. E. 278.

Breaking into other room in hotel.

If a person, being lawfully a guest in a hotel, breaks into other parts of the house, where he has no right to enter, for the purpose of committing a felony, it is burglary, the same as if he had broken in from the outside. State v. Clark, 42 Vt. 629, 636.

Constructive breaking.

In burglary, "constructive breaking," as distinguished from actual, forcible breaking, may be classed under the following heads: (1) Entries obtained by threats; (2) when, in consequence of violence done or threatened in order to obtain entry, the owner, with a view more effectually to repel it, opens the door and sallies out, and the felon enters; (3) when entrance is obtained by procuring the service of some intermediate person, such as a servant, to remove the fastening; (4) when some process of law is fraudulently resorted to for the purpose of obtaining an entrance; (5) when some trick is resorted to to induce the owner to remove the fastenings and open the door, and the felon enters. State v. Henry, 31 N. C. 463, 468; Clarke v. Commonwealth, 25 Grat. 908, 912; Ducher v. State, 18 Ohio, 308, 317.

To obtain admission to a dwelling house at night with the intent to commit a felony by means of artifice or fraud, or on pretense of business or social intercourse, is a constructive breaking, and will sustain an indictment charging burglary by breaking and entering. Johnston v. Commonwealth, 85 Pa. 54, 64, 27 Am. Rep. 622.

"Breaking," as used in definitions of burglary, is any forcible or fraudulent act done for the purpose of obtaining admission to a building which could not otherwise be entered. "Procuring, by craft or by threats and intimidation, a person within a house to open the door, is, in legal contemplation, a breaking." State v. Moore, 22 S. W. 1086, 1088, 117 Mo. 395.

Under a statute punishing any person who shall break and enter in the daytime any railroad, freight, or passenger car, with intent to commit murder or robbery, etc., it is held that the term "break" has the same fixed and definite meaning as such word had acquired at common law when applied to dwelling houses. So it is held that obtaining admission to a car by means of artifice or fraud, with intent to commit a felony, is a constructive breaking, and will sustain a prosecution under the statute. In the case under consideration the accused concealed himself in a chest and had himself shipped in an express car, and in that way gained admission to the car, with intent to assault and rob the express messenger while the train was en route. Held, that this was a "breaking" within the meaning of the statute. Nichols v. State, 32 N. W. 543, 545, 68 Wis. 416, 60 Am. Rep. 870.

As destroy completeness of.

In an act providing that a person who shall willfully break, destroy, or injure the door of any building, shall be punished, etc., the words "break or destroy" mean to destroy the completeness of. State v. McBeth, 31 Pac. 145, 49 Kan. 584.

Entering through chimney.

The term "breaking," as used in a definition of burglary as being the breaking and entering, etc., does not require an actual breaking through fixed obstructions. An entry at night through a chimney into a log cabin constitutes a sufficient breaking. At ancient common law it was held "that, if a man entered into the dwelling house by an open door in the night and stole goods therein, it was sufficient to constitute burglary. See Cro. Car. 65, 265; Crompt. 32a; 27 Assise, 38. But it soon after became the settled law that an entry by an open door or window, or any hole in the wall or roof of the house, was not a burglarious entry. 1 Hale's Pl. Cr. 552; Kel. 67-70. Lord Hale says that it was held by Manwood, C. B., that, if a thief goes down a chimney to steal, this is a breaking and entering. The reason of this, he says, seems to be that the chimney is closed as much as the nature of the thing will admit. All the elementary writers of any note, from that day down to the present, lay down the law in the same way, and assign the same reason for it." State v. Willis, 52 N. C. 190, 191.

Entering through open door.

The word "breaking," as used in Rev. Code, § 3635, defining burglary as the "breaking in the night or day time into any dwelling house or building, with intent to commit a felony," means an actual breaking, or a constructive one of fraud, threats, or conspiracy; and hence it is held that if a person enters a store through an open door, secretes himself, and the door is locked, then commits a larceny and escapes by opening or breaking out a window, he is not guilty of breaking. Brown v. State, 55 Ala. 123, 125, 28 Am. Rep. 693.

Code 1833, § 4386, defining burglary to be a "breaking and entering into," etc., does not include an act of one in entering a house with the intent to commit a felony, where the entrance was made through an open door without any breaking, though the party unbolted a door to get out. White v. State, 51 Ga. 285, 288.

"Break," as used in an indictment charging that a person did by force, in the nighttime, break and enter a house, imports violence used by such person to obtain entrance in the house, and any violence is sufficient. The charge is not supported by evidence that the house was open—not a door or window closed—and that defendant in his stocking feet entered through the open door without the consent of any one, and without any force whatever being used against the building or any occupant therein to effect the entry. Melton v. State, 6 S. W. 303, 304, 24 Tex. App. 287.

"Break," as used in reference to burglary, and defined in Pen. Code, § 499, as the opening for the purpose of entering therein by any means whatever any outer door of a building," is established if the proof shows that the accused opened by any means the outer door of the apartment named. Walking in through an open door would not constitute the offense. People v. Gartland, 52 N. Y. Supp. 352, 30 App. Div. 534.

Force implied.

The term "breaking," as it is used in an indictment for burglary, charging the breaking and entering by defendant, necessarily includes force, and means a forcible breaking. Mathews v. State, 36 Tex. 675.

"Break," as used in an indictment charging that the defendant did break and enter a certain house, implied force. Shotwell v. State, 43 Ark. 345, 347.

By the term "breaking," as used in article 2360, is meant that the entry must be made with actual force. The slightest force, however, is sufficient to constitute breaking. It may be by lifting the latch of the door that is shut, by raising a window, the entry at a chimney or other unusual place, or the introduction of the hand or any instrument to draw out the property through an aperture made for that purpose. Code (Pasch. Dig.) art. 2363. Franco v. State, 42 Tex. 276, 280.

By the term "breaking," in the article defining burglary in the daytime, is meant that the entry must be made with actual force. The slightest force, however, is sufficient to constitute breaking. It may be by lifting the latch of the door that is shut, or by raising a window, the entry at a chimney, or other unusual place, the introduction of the hand or any instrument to draw out the property through an aperture made by the offender for that purpose. Pen. Code Tex. 1895, art. 842.

The illustrations of the term "breaking," in the statute itself, are "the lifting of a latch," "the raising of a window," "the entry at a chimney," "the introduction of a hand or instrument," etc., evincing conclusively that it is used contradistinctive from force by violence. It must have been intended in this definition that, although some force is a necessary element in the constitution of the offense of burglary, yet the burglary committed by breaking is only such force as is sufficient to effect a clandestine entry. It is not such force as would excite alarm and provoke opposition. State v. Robertson, 32 Tex. 159, 163.

Opening closed door.

Unlatching a door which is only latched is a sufficient breaking to constitute burglary. People v. Bush, 3 Parker, Cr. R. 552, 557; State v. O'Brien, 46 N. W. 861, 81 Iowa, 93; State v. Groning, 5 Pac. 446, 447, 33 Kan. 18; State v. Moore, 22 S. W. 1086, 1088, 117

Mo. 395; People v. Gartland, 52 N. Y. Supp. 352, 30 App. Div. 534; State v. Snow (Del.) 51 Atl. 607, 608, 3 Pen. 259.

Lifting the latch of an outer door, and thereby effecting an entrance, although the door is not otherwise fastened, is a sufficient breaking and entering under an indictment for burglary. To constitute burglary, there must be a breaking,—removing, or putting aside of some material which constitutes a part of the dwelling house, and is relied on as a security against intrusion. But if the entrance be effected through an opening previously there, without forcible enlargement of it, this cannot be a burglarious entrance, unless it is effected through an open chimney. This rule applies to a door or window left open, or any other opening in the house through which the ingress is effected. Carter v. State, 68 Ala. 96, 98.

"Breaking," as used in a law forbidding a forcible breaking by a sheriff holding civil process, does not mean a positive breaking, or the removal of some extraordinary fastening, but includes merely lifting the latch and thus opening the outer door. It is enough that the outer door be shut. Merely opening is a "breaking" within the meaning of the law. Curtis v. Hubbard (N. Y.) 1 Hill, 336, 338.

In the law of burglary "breaking," is the slightest force, such as the lifting of a latch of a door that is shut, the raising of a window, the entering at a chimney or other unusual place. It is a breaking to lift the latch of the door to an office in the corner of a hardware room made of pickets four feet high, one inch square, and three inches apart, or by climbing over such picketed inclosure. Anderson v. State, 17 Tex. App. 305, 310.

The pushing open a door naturally closed is a sufficient breaking to sustain a conviction under a charge of breaking and entering a dwelling house with intent to commit a felony. May v. State, 24 South. 498, 40 Fla. 426; State v. Reid, 20 Iowa, 413, 418; State v. Moon, 64 Pac. 609, 611, 62 Kan. 801.

The word "break," in Code, c. 192, § 12, p. 728, making the breaking and entering of a dwelling house in the daytime a felony, was borrowed from the law in regard to burglary, and is therefore to be understood as it would be when used in a charge of burglary. If, then, in any case, a party shall, by even slight force, remove or displace anything attached to the house as part thereof, and relied on by the occupant for safety of the house, it is housebreaking within the meaning of the statute, if the other constituent parts of the offense exist. In this case, the door through which the entry was made was not fastened by any lock, latch, or bar, nothing of the kind being there, the door fitting closely within the casing, and, when closed, some degree of force was required to open it. This was its only fastening. The opening of this closed door was held a "breaking" within the statute. Finch v. Commonwealth, 14 Grat. 643, 645.

"Breaking," as the term is used in describing an element of burglary, is any unlawful entry to the closed portion of a building for an unlawful purpose. Thus, when a person who had no business in a factory effects an entrance by turning the door knob, thereby withdrawing the bolt used in the daytime to keep the door closed, which was done early in the morning after the door was unlocked, but before it had come into general use for the day by the public, or even by the employees of the establishment, there was a sufficient breaking to establish the offense. Kent v. State, 11 S. E. 355, 84 Ga. 438, 20 Am. St. Rep. 376.

Rev. St. c. 155, provides that if any person, with intent to commit a felony, shall at any time break and enter any office, bank, shop, or warehouse, he shall be punished by imprisonment in the state prison. It was doubtless the design of the Legislature to use the words "break and enter," when defining this offense, in the sense in which they are used to define the crime of burglary, and to constitute that offense there must be proof of an actual breaking, or that which is equivalent to it. Proof of an illegal entrance merely, such as would enable the party injured to maintain trespass quare clausum, will not be sufficient. Nor will proof of an entrance merely for a purpose ever so felonious and foul, accomplished by any conceivable stratagem, be sufficient if there be no actual breaking. It is immaterial by what kind of felonious breaking entrance is effected. Our statute, in defining this offense, makes no difference respecting the time of breaking and entrance. The same acts will constitute the offense, irrespective of light or darkness. But where a store was lighted up, and the doors were merely latched in the ordinary manner, without any fastenings to exclude others, the clerks being in the store ready to attend on customers, defendant, who lifted the latch and entered the store by the door, with the intention to commit a larceny therein, and did so enter and commit a larceny, secretly, without the knowledge of the attendants, was not guilty of breaking and entering under the statute. State v. Newbegin, 25 Me. 500, 503.

Opening locked door.

Technically, to open a locked door with the owner's key is a sufficient breaking to constitute burglary, though the key be left within the reach of every comer, and prove a temptation to the dishonest by affording easy opportunity to commit larceny. Colbert v. State, 17 S. E. 840, 841, 91 Ga. 705.

1 Wds. & P.—55

Opening screen door.

Opening a screen door not fastened, but hung on spring hinges which serve to keep it closed, is a "breaking" within the statute relating to larceny. State v. Conners, 64 N. W. 295, 95 Iowa, 485.

Opening second door.

To "break," within the meaning of the term as used in the law of burglary, is shown by evidence that defendant gained admission to a house by opening a door from the cellarway, though there was another door opening outwardly before the first door was reached. The fact that there was another door opening outwardly before reaching it did not make it the inner door of a house. Like a storm door, the door was a barrier, and access to the house could not be obtained until the second door was used. McCourt v. People, 64 N. Y. 583, 585.

One who enters a railroad depot through an open outer door, and then breaks and enters an inner door, is guilty of a breaking sufficient to constitute a burglary. State v. Scripture, 42 N. H. 485, 488.

Opening unfastened transom.

An entering into a building by raising a transom window which was attached by hinges above and so arranged that it would fall into the frame by its own weight, and which required some force to open it, constituted a breaking. Dennis v. People, 27 Mich. 151, 152.

"Break," as used in a statute providing that to forcibly break and enter any house, etc., with intent to commit a felony, shall constitute a burglary, only requires the degree of force that was implied at common law from the word "break." Force sufficient to open an unfastened transom swinging horizontally over an outer door of a dwelling house is sufficient to constitute forcible breaking. "In England, for more than two hundred years, it has been settled that there can be no burglary without an actual breaking, and in Sir Matthew Hale's time (1 Hale's P. C. 552) these acts amounted to an actual breaking, viz., opening the casement or breaking the glass windows, picking open the lock of a door with a false key, or putting back the lock with a knife or dagger, unlatching a door that is only latched, and to put back the leaf of a window with a dagger. In Rex v. Haines, 2 R. & Ry. C. O. 450, it is decided that the pulling down of the sash of a window is a breaking, though it has no fastening and is only kept in its place by the pulley weight. It is equally a breaking although there is an outer shutter which is not put up." Timmons v. State, 34 Ohio St. 426, 428, 32 Am. Rep. 376.

Opening window.

Raising a window that is closed constitutes a "breaking," within the meaning of that term as used in reference to a trespass on real estate by breaking and entering. McCusker v. Mitchell, 36 Atl. 1123, 1124, 20 R. I. 13; State v. Moore, 22 S. W. 1086, 1088, 117 Mo. 395.

A breaking and entering sufficient to constitute burglary is not accomplished by the defendant's effecting an entrance into a building through a window by lifting the sash, which lacked from a fourth of an inch to an inch of being closed. Commonwealth v. Strupney, 105 Mass. 588, 7 Am. Rep. 556.

Raising trapdoor.

Raising a trapdoor merely kept down by its own gravitation constitutes a breaking. State v. Moore, 22 S. W. 1086, 1088, 117 Mo. 395.

Removing loose plank in partition.

Removing a plank in a partition wall of a building, which was loose and which was not fixed to the freehold was not a sufficient breaking to constitute burglary. Commonwealth v. Trimmer, 1 Mass. 476, 477.

Removing window netting.

Where the window of a dwelling house was covered with a netting of double twine nailed to the sides, top, and bottom, the cutting and tearing down the netting and entering the house through the window was a sufficient breaking to constitute burglary. Commonwealth v. Stephenson, 25 Mass. (8 Pick.) 354, 355.

BREAKING PACKAGES.

"Breaking packages," as applied to imported goods, means a breaking or destruction of the entirety of the package, consisting of a number of things bound together for convenience in handling and conveyance. State v. Board of Assessors, 15 South. 10, 11, 46 La. Ann. 145, 49 Am. St. Rep. 318.

BREEDING.

Animals are imported for "breeding purposes," within the statute allowing them to be admitted free of duty, where the importer in good faith intends them for that purpose, and it does not prevent his otherwise disposing of them if he afterwards finds it necessary or desirable so to do. United States v. One Hundred and Ninety-Six Mares (U. S.) 29 Fed. 139.

BREEDING BACK.

The term, within a contract giving the privilege of "breeding back" again next season if a mare fails to prove with foal, only means to give the right so to do if the animals both live another season. Price v. Pepper, 76 Ky. (13 Bush) 42, 43.

BRETHREN.

Testator, in separate clauses of his will, bequeathed to each of his five children, one of whom was a son and four of whom were daughters, certain personality to them and their heirs forever. The legacy to N., one of the daughters, was a female slave. Another clause of the will was as follows: "It is my will that if any one or more of my children, above named, should die without issue, that his or her part or parts, should be divided equally between the surviving brethren." Held, that the word "brethren" meant the survivors of the legatees named, whether daughter or son. Terry v. Brunson, 1 Rich. Eq. (S. C.) 78, 87.

BREVI ANTICIPANTIA.

Under the old practice, courts of equity, proceeding in analogy to certain writs of the common law denominated by Coke "brevia anticipantia," or writs of prevention (Co. Litt. 100a), were accustomed to grant relief to a surety, on his application for that purpose, by bill quia timet, in two different ways: (1) By allowing him to proceed against both creditor and debtor, to compel the latter to pay the debt; or (2) the surety might proceed against the creditor alone to compel him to bring his action. Story's Eq. Jur. §§ 327, 638, 849. And our statute (Wag. St. c. 132, p. 1302), which allows notice to be given to the creditor, is no doubt only substitutionary, although it may not be exclusively so, of the ancient chancery practice by which an exoneration of a surety was formerly accomplished. Peters v. Linenschmidt, 58 Mo. 464, 466.

BREWER.

Brewers were originally defined as "persons who brewed for sale," but it is now conceded that a person who brews beer, though not for sale, carries on the business of a brewer, although one who distills for his own use merely would not be said to carry on the business of a distillery. United States v. Wittig (U. S.) 28 Fed. Cas. 744, 745.

A brewer is defined in Rev. St. § 3244 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 2096] as "a person who makes fermented liquor, of any name or description, for sale, from malt, wholly or in part, or from any substitute therefor." This clearly comprehends the making of every kind of malted liquor. United States v. Dooley (U. S.) 25 Fed. Cas. 890, 891.

BREWERY.

A brewery is a building and its appurtenances especially adapted to the manufacture of beer. Mugler v. State, 8 Sup. Ct. 273, 279, 123 U. S. 623, 31 L. Ed. 205; State v. Weckerling, 38 La. Ann. 36, 38.

BRIBE.

Bribery was an indictable offense at common law, and although, in the early days, it was limited to judicial officers and those engaged in the administration of justice, it was later extended to all public officers. It was variously defined as taking or offering an undue reward, or a reward to influence official action. It is otherwise defined as the giving, offering, or receiving of anything of value, or any valuable services, intended to influence one in the discharge of a legal duty. People v. Van De Carr, 84 N. Y. Supp. 461, 463, 87 App. Div. 386.

The word "bribe" signifies anything of value or advantage, present or prospective, or any promise or undertaking to give any, asked, given, or accepted with a corrupt intent to influence unlawfully the person to whom it is given in his action, vote, or opinion in any public or official capacity. Pen. Code Ariz. 1901, § 7, subd. 6; Pen. Code Cal. 1903, § 7, subd. 6; Pen. Code Idaho 1901, § 4544, subd. 6; Pen. Code Mont. 1895, § 7, subd. 6; People v. Markham, 30 Pac. 620, 621, 64 Cal. 157, 49 Am. Rep. 700; People v. Ward, 42 Pac. 894, 895, 110 Cal. 369.

"Bribe" or "bribery" means any reward, benefit, or advantage, present or future, to the party influenced or intended to be influenced, or to another at his instance, or the promise of such reward, benefit, or advantage. Ky. St. 1903, § 1586; Commonwealth v. Stephenson, 60 Ky. (3 Metc.) 226, 228; Commonwealth v. Root, 96 Ky. 533, 535, 29 S. W. 351; Commonwealth v. Headley, 64 S. W. 744, 745, 111 Ky. 815, 23 Ky. Law Rep. 1104, 1105 (quoting Ky. St. § 1586, subd. 1); Cheek v. Commonwealth, 87 Ky. 42, 44, 7 S. W. 403, 404 (quoting Gen. St. § 11, art. 12, c. 33).

"Bribe," as used in the Penal Code, signifies any money, goods, right in action, property, thing of value or advantage, present or prospective, or any promise or undertaking to give any, asked, given, or accepted, with a corrupt intent to influence unlawfully the person to whom it is given in his action, vote, or opinion in any public or official capacity. Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 2691; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 7718; Pen. Code S. D. 1903, § 813; Rev. St. Utah 1898, § 4053.

By a "bribe," as used in the Penal Code, is meant any gift, emolument, money, or thing of value, testimonial, privilege, appointment, or personal advantage, or the promise of either, bestowed or promised for the purpose of influencing an officer or other person, such as are named in this chapter, in the performance of any duty, public or official, or as an inducement to favor the person offering the same or some other person. Pen. Code Tex. 1895, art. 144.

A "bribe" is defined to be a price, reward, gift, or favor, bestowed or promised, with a view to pervert the judgment or corrupt the conduct of a judge, witness, or other person. To "bribe" means to give a bribe to a person to pervert his judgment or corrupt his action by some gift or promise. Keeping open house for the entertainment of legislators does not constitute the giving of a bribe. Randall v. Evening News Ass'n, 97 Mich. 136, 143, 56 N. W. 361.

As used in the consolidation act, declaring that every officer enumerated therein who "shall accept a gift or promise with the agreement or understanding that his vote or action shall be influenced thereby" shall be guilty of a felony, has the same meaning as the phrase "receives or agrees to receive a bribe," as used in Pen. Code, § 72, providing that every officer who "receives or agrees to receive a bribe" shall be guilty of a felony. People v. Jaehne, 8 N. E. 374, 378, 103 N. Y. 182.

"Bribe," as used in a certificate of acknowledgment of a deed by a married woman that she signed such deed without any "bribe," threat, or compulsion from that of her husband, means undue influence, improper inducement, or allurement by the husband. Belcher v. Weaver, 46 Tex. 293, 294, 26 Am. Rep. 267.

"Bribe," as used in a statute making it criminal to "bribe" or offer to "bribe" any sheriff or other peace officer to permit any prisoner to escape, means "any gift, advancement or emolument bestowed for the purpose of inducing such sheriff or other officer to permit any prisoner in his custody to escape." O'Brien v. State, 6 Tex. App. 665, 667.

BRIBERY.

At common law, "bribery," as defined by Bishop, in 2 Bishop, New Cr. Law, § 85, is: "The voluntary giving or receiving of anything of value in corrupt payment for an official act done or to be done." The statute of Missouri (Rev. St. 1899, §§ 2084, 2085) has changed the common-law offense of bribery, and has divided the crime into two divisions. Under the statute there are two distinct offenses, one for giving, the other for receiving, a bribe; both are termed "bribery." State v. Meysenburg, 71 S. W. 229, 232, 171 Mo. 1.

Bribery is the receiving or offering any undue reward by or to any person whatever whose ordinary profession or business relates to the administration of public justice, in order to influence his behavior in office and incline him to act contrary to the known rules of honesty and integrity. Hall v. Marshall, 80 Ky. 552, 563; State v. Womack, 29 Pac. 939, 941, 4 Wash. 19; State v. Ellis, 33 N. J. Law (4 Vroom) 102, 103, 97 Am. Dec. 707; State v. Miles, 36 Atl. 70, 72, 89 Me. 142. In the more extended sense the offense may be committed by any person in an official situation who shall corruptly use the power and interest of his place for rewards or promises, and by any person who shall give or offer to take a reward for offices of a public nature. Opinion of Scott, J., in Walsh v. People, 65 Ill. 58, 65, 16 Am. Rep. 569; State v. Davis (Del.) 45 Atl. 394, 395, 2 Pennewill, 139.

The taking or offering a reward to influence official conduct is a necessary ingredient in bribery. Watson v. State, 29 Ark. 299, 301.

"Bribery" means any reward, benefit, or advantage, present or future, to the party influenced or intended to be influenced, or to another at his instance, or the promise of such reward, benefit, or advantage; and at common law was defined as the crime of offering any undue reward, or remuneration to any public officer, or other person intrusted with a public duty, with a view to influence his behavior in the discharge of his duties. Curran v. Taylor, 18 S. W. 232, 92 Ky. 537.

"Bribery is the corruptly giving, offering, or promising a thing, gift, or gratuity to any judicial officer with intent to influence his act, decision, or opinion on any matter pending before him in his official capacity. The offense of bribery may be completely committed by the corrupter whether the other party shall afterwards perform his promise or break it. The offense might be completed though it appeared that the person to whom the bribe was offered never intended to be influenced thereby, concealing such intention from the person offering the bribe, but being so far moved as to receive the money." Commonwealth v. Murray, 135 Mass. 530, 532.

Bribery is the crime of bestowing some gift, advantage, or emolument on an officer for the purpose of inducing the latter "to do a particular act in violation of his duty, or as an inducement to favor or in some manner to aid the person offering the same, or some other person, in a manner forbidden by law." Hutchinson v. State, 36 Tex. 293, 294.

"Bribery may be defined to be the giving (and perhaps offering) to another anything of value, or any valuable services, intending to influence him in the discharge of some legal duty." Dishon v. Smith, 10 Iowa, 212, 221.

Within Const. art. 3, § 32, providing that persons may be compelled to testify in any lawful proceeding against one charged with the offense of bribery, but such testimony shall not afterwards be used against the witness except for perjury in giving such testimony, the words "offense of bribery" include all bribery, whether bribery at common law, or under the Constitution itself, or any kind of statutory bribery, and thus includes bribery of delegates to a convention for the nomination of candidates to Congress, bribery having been used in different statutes in its common-law sense, and also applies to other forms of bribery. Commonwealth v. Bell, 22 Atl. 641, 644, 145 Pa. 374.

Act of two persons essential.

To constitute "bribery," the act of at least two persons is essential, that of him who gives and him who receives. The minds of the two must concur, and it is immaterial whether the giver first makes the advances or gives the money to get some personal advantage to himself. In fact, in most, if not all, of the cases, the very object of the giving of a bribe is to obtain for the giver, or the one for whom he is acting, some supposed advantage or gain for himself. Newman v. People, 47 Pac. 278, 280, 23 Colo. 300.

As felony.

See "Felony."

Inducing school officer to attend meeting.

The payment or offer of a valuable consideration to a public officer to influence him in the discharge of a legal duty constitutes the offense. So that the giving of a sum of money to a commissioner of the board of education of a school district to influence him to attend a meeting in relation to a selection of books constituted bribery, so as to render the action of the board void. Honaker v. Board of Education of Pocatello Dist., 24 S. E. 544, 546, 42 W. Va. 170, 32 L. R. A. 413, 57 Am. St. Rep. 847.

Influencing removal of county seat.

The giving or offering to give facilities for the public convenience of the whole county as an inducement to remove a county seat, or the offering of public advantage for the entire community as an inducement for the members of such community to vote for such removal, does not constitute bribery. Hall v. Marshall, 80 Ky. 552, 563.

Influencing vote for senator.

The term "bribery" includes the act of corruptly offering money to a legislator as an inducement to vote for United States senator. State v. Davis (Del.) 45 Atl. 394, 395, 2 Pennewill, 139.

BRICK.

"Brick," as used in an ordinance or resolution of a city council specifying that a pavement should be of "brick," justly and reasonably implies that the brick shall be paving brick of the kind ordinarily used, and hence the specification is sufficient. Taber v. Grafmiller, 9 N. E. 721, 722, 109 Ind. 206.

Among builders and mechanics a "brick" is understood to be eight inches in length, four inches in width, and two inches in thickness, and where an ordinance simply describes the material out of which an improvement shall be made as of "brick," "paving brick," or "sewer brick," every one will understand that it means brick of the ordinary dimensions, and of the best quality for that particular structure. Peters v. City of Chicago, 61 N. E. 438, 192 Ill. 437.

Fire brick.

The word "brick," as used in the internal revenue acts (section 75, Act July 1, 1862, and section 94, Act June 30, 1864), does not include a fire brick. De Casse v. Spader (U S.) 7 Fed. Cas. 321.

BRICK BUILDING.

Where, on account of a settling of one of the walls of a brick building, it was found necessary to replace a portion of it temporarily with wood, and while in that condition it was insured as a "brick building," such description did not amount to a warranty, but merely as identification. The term did not inaccurately describe the building, as it was a brick building in common parlance. Gerhauser v. North British & Mercantile Ins. Co., 7 Nev. 174, 186.

BRICK FACTORY.

A conveyance of land with all belongings standing thereon, except the "brick factory," means the "brick factory" with the right to occupy the land on which the factory stood, and all appurtenances necessary to the use of the factory. Allen v. Scott, 38 Mass. (21 Pick.) 25, 28, 32 Am. Dec. 238.

BRICK HOUSE.

A devise of "the rents of a brick house" entitles the devisee to rents of not only that part of the lot on which the house stands, but to rents of the entire lot. Common Council of City of Richmond v. State, 5 Ind. 334, 337 (cited in Indianapolis, D. & W. Ry. Co. v. First Nat. Bank, 33 N. E. 679, 680, 134 Ind. 127).

BRICK IN THE WALL.

A contract for the erection of a building provided that the contractor should be paid at the rate of $8 per thousand for "bricks in the wall." Held, that the words "bricks in the wall" was a term having a well-defined meaning, requiring that the bricks should be counted, and, if it was not practicable to ascertain the number by an actual count, they could be ascertained by estimates based on measurements after counting the number of bricks in a cubic yard of the wall; and hence the contractor was not entitled to prove a custom of brick-masons to count 21 brick for every lineal foot of a 13-inch wall, and 14 brick for every foot in a nine-inch wall, which did not allow for mortar, and ascertain the number of bricks in the wall by measurement based on such method. Sweeney v. Thomason, 77 Tenn. (9 Lea) 359, 42 Am. Rep. 678.

BRICK MASON.

It is questionable whether the term "brick mason" is sufficiently comprehensive, properly and technically speaking, to embrace brick makers and brick burners. Robinson v. Mace, 16 Ark. 97, 102.

BRICK STORE.

A search warrant authorizing the search of a brick store for intoxicating liquors is to be construed as sufficient to authorize the search of the wooden portion of a building opening into a brick building, and forming one part of a store there kept, which is known in a neighborhood as the "brick store," to distinguish it from a frame store situated in the same neighborhood. Lowrey v. Gridley, 30 Conn. 450, 460.

BRICKWORK.

An agreement to do an amount of brickwork may mean simply to perform the work of laying the brick, or, in addition, to furnish the brick as well as lay them. In construing such a contract, parol evidence is admissible to show that the contractor was to furnish the materials. Streppone v. Lennon, 37 N. E. 638, 143 N. Y. 626.

BRIDAL PRESENT.

Where the vital issue in a case was whether or not a note was given as an inducement to procure marriage, and, if not, for what it was given, a finding by the jury, in response to a special question, that the note was given as a bridal present, meant that the note was not given in consideration of marriage. Hatchett v. Hatchett, 67 S. W. 163, 165, 28 Tex. Civ. App. 33.

BRIDGE.

See "County Bridges"; "Ferry Bridge"; "Private Bridge"; "Public Bridge"; "Suitable Bridge."

All bridge structures, see "All."
Any bridge, see "Any."

A bridge is a structure of wood, iron, brick, or stone, ordinarily erected over a river, brook, or lake for the more convenient passage of persons and beasts and the transportation of baggage. Enfield Toll Bridge Co. v. Hartford & N. H. R. Co., 17 Conn. 40, 56, 42 Am. Dec. 716; Madison County Com'rs v. Brown, 89 Ind. 48, 52; Town of Tolland v. Town of Willington, 26 Conn. 578, 583.

A bridge is a structure over a river, creek, pond, lake, or stream of water flowing in a channel between banks more or less defined, although the channel may be occasionally dry. Clark County Com'rs v. Brod, 29 N. E. 430, 431, 3 Ind. App. 585.

The term "bridge" has never "represented any structure or material thing which had not a footway across the stream. Not for the last thousand years has the term 'bridge,' either in England or this country, represented any structure which had not a footway, a horseway, and a wagonway. The footway for man and beast is of the very essence of the bridge. The footway is the bridge, and the bridge is the footway. What must have been the history of civilization upon this subject? A bridge, reduced to its simplest elements, is a plank resting on the natural banks, furnishing a footpath. This footpath is the seminal principle of the bridge. All the rest is but growth and development. Take away the plank and there is nothing of a bridge. The next advance would be, perhaps, a natural rock in the middle of the stream, serving as a rude pier for the ends of the planks to rest upon. Again, take away the planks and there is nothing of the bridge. Adding the artificial pier or the artificial abutment is nothing towards a bridge. Neither are necessary. It is still the pathway that is the bridge. So when, in the progress of skill, they widen the pathway to make it a horseway, and then again widen it so that beasts may draw wagons after them, it is still the pathway that makes the bridge. So when they add handrails and balustrades, it is only to make the bridge, as we commonly say, or the pathway, more secure. And so, in all its stages of development, from the rude plank to Trajan's magnificent arches over the Danube, or to Roebling's sublime but inverted arch over the boiling chasm of Niagara, or Stevenson's rigid tubes over the wide waters of the St. Lawrence, it is the pathway only that makes the bridge. The pathway, by whatever contrivance supported, whether supported on the natural banks and rock, or the strong towers of Niagara, whatever the kind of bridge, or by whatever name called, it is the pathway that makes the bridge, whether it be a floating or a flying bridge, whether of boats, like that of Xerxes over the Dardanelles, or of pontoons, like that with which a modern general crosses an interposing stream, whether built upon piers or upon arches, whether suspended upon ropes or sustained by its own rigidity, whether built of wood or stone, of cast iron, or wrought iron, whether a chain bridge or wire bridge, whether one arch or many, whether resting on piling or on solid piers, whether covered or not, whether with hand railings or balustrades or not—it is still the pathway that makes the bridge. Nor has any structure which in its development stopped short of this pathway for man and beast, ever in ancient or in modern times, in any country or in any language having a synonym for the term, been called a 'bridge.' I have been able to find no royal charter, no act of Parliament, from the time the word 'bridge' first fell from the lips of our Anglo-Saxon ancestors until the present moment, no act of the Legislature in our own state, or any of our sister states, from the earliest colonial records, no decision of any court, at any time or in any country whatever, no dictionary, no encyclopedia, no work on mechanical science, no scientific work specially upon bridges, where a structure without a pathway was ever denominated a 'bridge.' The very nature and essence of the thing forbid that there should be a bridge without a pathway. The bridge, for all time and in all countries, has been but the continuation of the ordinary roadway. The only difference between a bridge and the rest of the road is that in the road the pathway rests immediately on the earth, while in the bridge it does not. Whenever the pathway of the ordinary road does not rest immediately on the earth, it is called a 'bridge,' by whatever contrivance supported, whether by water, by piers, by arches, by wires, by tubes, and whether it passes over rivers or gorges, or ravines or valleys, or canals or railroads, and we can just as well have a road without a bottom as a bridge without a footway." Proprietors of Passaic & Hackensack River Bridges v. Hoboken Land Imp. Co., 13 N. J. Eq. (2 Beasl.) 503, 511.

The term "bridge" is a comprehensive one, and embraces every structure in the nature of a bridge over any obstruction to the highway, whether a river, ditch, or other passage for water. Though the statute says that a bridge must be not less than 16 feet wide, we are not to understand that the road district is in no case required to construct its bridges more than that width, and when a wider bridge is constructed it must be kept in suitable repair for the whole width. Rusch v. City of Davenport, 6 Iowa (6 Clarke) 443, 455.

In the technical meaning of the common law, a "bridge" was a structure for passage over a river. State v. Inhabitants of Hudson County, 30 N. J. Law (1 Vroom) 137, 148; Parrot v. Lawrence (U. S.) 18 Fed. Cas. 1,234, 1,235.

In this country, generally, "bridges" and highways have not been treated as distinct and separate subjects of legislative provision. Bridges are considered to be portions of the highways which pass over them, unless the import of the term is limited by statute. It means any structure by which a highway is carried over a place. A bridge has therefore been defined to be a building constructed over a river, creek, or other stream, or over a ditch or other place, in order to facilitate the passage over the same. Whitall

v. Board of Chosen Freeholders of Gloucester County, 40 N. J. Law (11 Vroom) 303, 305.

The word "bridge" conveys the idea of a passageway by which travelers and others are enabled to pass safely over streams or other obstructions. A structure of stone which spans the width of a stream, but is wholly inaccessible at either end, whatever may be its architecture, is not a "bridge." Home Building & Conveyance Co. v. City of Roanoke, 20 S. E. 895, 897, 91 Va. 52, 27 L. R. A. 551; Chosen Freeholders of Sussex County v. Strader, 35 Am. Dec. 530, 532, 18 N. J. Law (3 Har.) 108.

Structures forming parts of railroad beds by which they span streams, chasms, ditches, etc., are "bridges" within the meaning of McClell. Dig. p. 358, § 4, punishing the willful and malicious burning of a bridge. Duncan v. State, 29 Fla. 439, 453, 10 South. 815.

The word "bridge," as used in certain provisions defining and punishing offenses relating to roads, bridges, etc., includes any state or county bridge owned by a company or person. Code W. Va. 1899, p. 355, c. 43, § 44.

The power to bridge a navigable stream includes the right to make repairs. Kansas City, M. & B. R. Co. v. J. T. Wiygul & Son (Miss.) 33 South. 965, 61 L. R. A. 578 (citing Rhea v. Newport N. & M. V. R. Co. [U. S.] 50 Fed. 16; Hamilton v. Vicksburg, S. & P. R. Co., 7 Sup. Ct. 206, 119 U. S. 280, 30 L. Ed. 393; Adams v. Ulmer, 91 Me. 47, 53, 39 Atl. 347).

Abutment as part of.

A "bridge" includes not only the structure across a stream, but its abutments also, so finished that travelers and others may safely pass thereon. Board of Chosen Freeholders of Sussex County v. Strader, 18 N. J. Law (3 Har.) 108; Township of Kearney v. Ballantine, 23 Atl. 821, 822, 54 N. J. Law, 194.

As used in Rev. St. 1876, c. 239, providing for the erection of bridges by county commissioners, "bridge" means not only the structure itself and its approaches, but its abutments and bankments, railings, etc. Driftwood Val. Turnpike Com'rs v. Bartholomew County Com'rs, 72 Ind. 226, 237.

The term "bridge," as the term is used in connection with the use for which the bridge is erected, includes the abutments thereto. The abutment is so connected with the bridge that "we can no more exclude the abutment from our mind than the flooring or framework of the bridge." Bardwell v. Town of Jamaica, 15 Vt. 438, 442.

By the English law the highway 300 feet from each end of a bridge was considered as a part of the bridge for purposes of repair, and in this country the highway at the end of a bridge may be considered as connected with the bridge. A bridge with its abutments is coextensive with the entire excavation in the highway, and is not to be limited to the exterior line of the stone walls and the plank structure resting on those walls. Titcomb v. Fitchburg R. Co., 94 Mass. (12 Allen) 254, 259.

Where a report directing the erecting of a highway bridge required a wing wall to be built from each end of the west abutment to the bank, and "to be filled up with stone and gravel well compacted," the space included between the wing walls and the bank constituted a part of the bridge. Powers v. Town of Woodstock, 38 Vt. 44, 49.

Approaches as part of.

The term "bridge" includes not only the structure spanning the chasm over which it is erected, but also includes the approaches by which access to the bridge is obtained, such approaches being as much a part of and appendages to the bridge as the bridge itself. Commonwealth v. Inhabitants of Deerfield, 88 Mass. (6 Allen) 449, 455; Cullen v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co., 33 Atl. 910, 912, 66 Conn. 211; Rex v. Inhabitants of West Riding of York County, 7 East, 588, 598; Everett v. Bailey, 150 Pa. 152, 153, 24 Atl. 700; Penn Tp. v. Perry County, 78 Pa. (28 P. F. Smith) 457, 459; Taylor Tp. v. Lawrence County, 17 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 396, 397; Francis v. Franklin Tp., 36 Atl. 202, 203, 179 Pa. 195; Albee v. Floyd County, 46 Iowa, 177, 178; Miller v. Boone County, 63 N. W. 352, 95 Iowa, 5; Moreland v. Mitchell County, 40 Iowa, 394, 397, 398; Driftwood Valley Turnpike Co. v. Bartholomew County Com'rs, 72 Ind. 226, 236; Shaw v. Saline Tp., 71 N. W. 642, 643, 113 Mich. 342; Tinkham v. Town of Stockbridge, 24 Atl. 761, 762, 64 Vt. 480.

The approaches to a bridge within reasonable limits—perhaps 300 feet—constitute a part of the bridge. Rush County Com'rs v. Rushville & V. Gravel Road Co., 87 Ind. 502, 505.

The term "bridge" may, under certain circumstances, include the approach thereto, thus imposing on the county the duty of keeping the approach in repair. Roby v. Appanoose County, 18 N. W. 711, 713, 63 Iowa, 113.

The approach to a bridge is not a part thereof, as a matter of law. Nims v. Boone County, 66 Iowa, 272, 23 N. W. 663.

"Bridge," as used in Act 1872, § 1, requiring the cities of New Haven and of East Haven to build and maintain a bridge over the river which formed a boundary between them, includes only the structure, and does not include the embankment necessary for access to the structure; and whether the word "bridge" will include the approaches to the structure proper depends on the connection in which the word is used, and is more a question of fact than of law. Phillips v. Town of East Haven, 44 Conn. 25, 81.

A city charter provided that the common council might from time to time order the building and widening or repair of all bridges crossing railroads in the city in such manner as in their judgment public convenience might require. Held, that the word "bridge" as used in the charter meant merely the bridge proper, to the exclusion of embankments and approaches. City of New Haven v. New York & N. H. R. Co., 39 Conn. 128, 131.

In Act 1862, § 5, providing that any bridge or bridges erected under the provisions of this act shall be lawful structures, and shall be recognized as post routes, etc., "bridge" does not include an existing street or public highway over lands which formed the approaches to the bridge, but is confined to the actual structure. Kentucky v. Louisville Bridge Co. (U. S.) 42 Fed. 241, 244.

Pub. Acts 1889, c. 214, p. 129, authorizing the owners of all bridges across a certain river between certain counties to transfer their right, title, and interest in such bridges to the counties, and making it the latter's duty thereupon to take the management of said bridges, refers only to bridge structures, and is exclusive of approaches thereto. The approach of a bridge may sometimes be regarded as a part of the bridge itself, and sometimes as a part of the highway leading to the bridge. The circumstances of each case must control. New Haven and Fairfield Counties v. Town of Milford, 30 Atl. 768, 769, 64 Conn. 568.

As building.

See "Building (In Lien Laws)."

Causeway, embankments, etc., as part of.

There was a stone wall running from the abutment of a bridge to the bank on each side, and this was filled in with dirt, making an approach to the bridge. The dirt approach was on a level from wall to wall. On each side stringers were laid on the dirt, and a plank walk made on the stringers for the accommodation of passengers. One end of this walk connected with the bridge, and the other with the sidewalk on the street leading to the bridge. Such sidewalk was not a part of the bridge. Saunders v. Township of Gun Plains, 76 Mich. 182, 42 N. W. 1088.

An embankment contiguous to a bridge, and necessary to enable teams and wagons to cross the stream over the bridge, is a part of the bridge, and title to the main bridge carries with it title to the abutment or embankment. Daniels v. Intendant & Wardens of Town of Athens, 55 Ga. 609, 611.

The word in a statute providing that a town should keep in repair a portion of a "bridge" connecting it with another town means the structure which crosses the stream, and its approaches, without including the causeways, in the absence of any custom, usage, or agreement which fixed the construction to be given to the word. Inhabitants of Swanzey v. Inhabitants of Somerset, 132 Mass. 312, 314.

"The sale of a bridge, together with the houses and privileges and appurtenances thereunto belonging," passes title to the land on which the bridge rests. Sparks v. Hess, 15 Cal. 186 (cited in Indianapolis, D. & W. Ry. Co. v. First Nat. Bank, 33 N. E. 679, 680, 134 Ind. 127).

Culvert for surface water.

See, also, "Culvert."

Bridges are built over streams where they cross the public highway, to facilitate travel and to render it convenient at all times. The object of their erection is to remove either a permanent or temporary obstruction. Some streams are so deep that they cannot be crossed at any time except on a bridge, while others are not impassable except when flooded, but a bridge is indispensable to a free and safe passage over either at all seasons and in all conditions of the stream, so that chosen freeholders having authority to build bridges can construct one over a water course created by surface water. McKinley v. Chosen Freeholders of Union County, 29 N. J. Eq. (2 Stew.) 164.

A bridge "denotes a structure of wood, iron, brick, or stone, ordinarily erected over a river, creek, pond, or lake, or over a ravine, railroad, canal, or other obstruction in the highway, so as to make a continuous roadway and afford to travelers a convenient passageway from one bank to the other. A culvert for draining surface water is not a bridge." Carroll County Com'rs v. Bailey, 23 N. E. 672, 673, 122 Ind. 46.

Where a statute authorizes a county to levy a tax in aid of bridges, the bridge must not necessarily cross a water course, but a bridge over a dry ravine is within the statute. State v. Pierce County Sup'rs, 37 N. W. 231, 232, 71 Wis. 321.

Ferry.

As ferry, see "Ferry."

A bridge is a permanent and stationary structure extending from one side of a stream, or other obstruction in the highway, to the other. A ferry for the transportation of passengers and goods from one side of the stream to the other cannot be regarded as a bridge. Parrot v. Lawrence (U. S.) 18 Fed. Cas. 1234, 1236.

The word "bridge" and the word "ferry" are equivalent terms, and therefore express power to establish a ferry necessarily implies power to establish a toll bridge. Where the power to establish a toll ferry has been granted in any city, the grant by necessary implication sanctions the power of establishing as a substitute for the toll ferry a toll bridge. Oloff v. City of Shreveport, 52 La. Ann. 1203, 27 South. 688.

As highway or street.

See "Highway"; "Street."

As land.

See "Land."

Parapet.

The fact that a structure was without parapet was not decisive of the question whether or not it was a bridge, nor was the fact that it was an arch over water flowing in a channel between banks, though nothing can be a bridge which is not built over such a flow. Rex v. Whitney, 3 Adol. & E. 69.

Part not over water.

A whole structure, consisting of 29 arches, which had from time immemorial been treated as one bridge, and the whole of it, from beginning to end, immemorially repaired by the county, and 22 out of the 29 arches been actually rebuilt by the county, conclusively show a whole structure to be one "bridge," within the meaning of laws requiring counties to repair public bridges, there being no rule of law prohibiting every part of the structure from being treated as a bridge under which water does not flow at all times. Regina v. Inhabitants of Derbyshire, 2 Q. B. 745.

As public building.

See "Public Building."

Railroad bridge.

The crossing of a river by a railroad track on piers, or what is known as a railroad bridge, is not a "bridge" in the ordinary sense of the term in which it is used in legislation concerning toll roads and bridges. Lake v. Virginia & T. R. Co., 7 Nev. 294, 307; Bridge Proprietors v. Hoboken Land & Improvement Co., 68 U. S. (1 Wall.) 116, 147, 17 L. Ed. 571; McLeod v. Savannah, A. & G. R. Co., 25 Ga. 445, 456.

"Bridge," as used in McClell. Dig. p. 358. § 4, making the burning of a bridge a criminal offense, is "a structure usually of wood, stone, brick, or iron, erected over a river or other water course, or over a chasm, railroad, etc., to make a passageway from one bank to the other; anything supported at the ends, which serves to keep some other thing from resting upon the object spanned, which forms a platform or staging over which something passes or is conveyed. Structures forming parts of railway beds, by which they span chasms, streams, ditches, etc." Duncan v. State, 10 South. 815, 817, 29 Fla. 439.

In its widest sense, the word "bridge" applies to any sort of structure extending from one point of support across an open space to another point of support, and of sufficient strength to permit the transit of some material object. In common acceptance the word was primarily applied to structures across streams for the passage of travelers in ordinary modes. Popularly the word "bridge" came to mean a structure whose primary object was the support of persons, animals, and vehicles while crossing a stream or ravine, but the word as now used includes not only highway bridges, but also structures which enter into and form a part of railroads. Smith Bridge Co. v. Bowman, 41 Ohio St. 37, 56, 52 Am. Rep. 66.

As structure.

Under a statute authorizing the taxation of real estate structures, and stationary personal property of railroads in its own local taxing district, a bridge will be held to come within the term "structures," and not under those of "roadbed" or "main track," the taxable valuation of which was to be distributed throughout the length of the line. Cowen v. Aldridge (U. S.) 114 Fed. 44, 50, 51 C. C. A. 670.

Viaduct.

A bridge is a pathway erected over a river, canal, road, etc., in order that a passage may be made from one side to the other. It is a structure usually of wood, stone, brick, or iron, erected over a river or other water course, or over a ravine, railroad, etc., to make a continuous roadway from one bank to the other, and hence the term "bridge" may be appropriately applied to viaducts constructed by a railroad company over the streets of a city, and it is within the power of the city to require such viaducts to be built under its power for the construction of bridges. City of Argentine v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co., 41 Pac. 946, 947, 55 Kan. 730, 30 L. R. A. 255.

Originally the term "bridge" applied only to structures erected over such waters as fall within the description "flumen vel cursus aquæ," but modern usage has given it a more enlarged signification, and Worcester defines it as a pathway erected over a river, canal, road, etc., in order that a passage may be made from one side to the other; and it includes a passageway over a railroad. State v. Inhabitants of Gorham, 37 Me. 451, 461.

In the statute giving boards of chosen freeholders authority to construct such bridges as may be proper in their discretion, the term "bridge" means any structure constructed over a river, stream, ditch, or other place, in order to facilitate the passage over the same, and is not limited to a structure spanning a water course, and a structure across a cut comes within the definition. Whitall v. Freeholders of Gloucester County, 40 N. J. Law, 302, 303, 305.

The construction of a viaduct over a river for a railway, to be used exclusively for its purpose, is not a "bridge" within the provision of a charter giving a corporation the exclusive franchise of maintaining a bridge at a certain point. Proprietors of Passaic & Hackensack River Bridges v. Hoboken Land & Improvement Co., 13 N. J. Eq. (2 Beas.) 81, 91.

It has been authoritatively adjudged that the simple term "bridge" means a viaduct in a road dedicated to common use. Funk v. St. Paul City Ry. Co., 63 N. W. 1099, 1100, 61 Minn. 435, 437, 29 L. R. A. 208, 52 Am. St. Rep. 608.

As wharf.

See "Wharf."

BRIDGE PIER.

A bridge pier is really a projecting wharf, a permanent structure attached to and firmly connected with the mainland, and loading a vessel from such a place one would naturally suppose was like taking in a cargo from shore. Johnson v. Northwestern Nat. Ins. Co., 39 Wis. 87, 90.

BRIDLE ROAD.

The term "bridle road," as used in the location of a private way made out by the selectmen of a town, has no such definite nor well-settled meaning in the law or by common usage as to authorize the inference that it was intended to be confined to use by horses only, and as equivalent to "horseway," and hence does not exclude the use of the way as a driftway for cattle. Flagg v. Flagg, 82 Mass. (16 Gray) 175, 181.

BRIEF.

A brief is a detailed statement of a party's case. Bouv. Law Dict. Burrill defines it as an abridgment of a plaintiff's or defendant's case, prepared by his attorney for the instruction of counsel on a trial at law. Gardner v. Stover, 43 Ind. 356, 357.

A brief is an abbreviated statement of the pleadings, proofs, and affidavits at law, or of the bill, answer, and other pleadings in equity, with a concise narrative of the facts of the plaintiff's case, or of the defendant's defense, for the instruction of counsel at the trial or hearing. A mere copy of a part of the assignment of errors cannot be dignified with the name of "brief." Parker v. Hastings, 12 Ind. 654, 656.

A brief is a mere statement of the points or propositions relied on to reverse or affirm a judgment, and of the matters in the record pertinent to sustain or rebut these points, and a reference to the authorities relied on by the parties, and should not contain either arguments, reasons, conclusions, or inferences. Haley v. Davidson, 48 Tex. 615, 618.

A brief should embrace nothing but the propositions, set forth clearly, distinctly, and separately, which are relied on for the reversal of the judgment, and the matters in the record pertinent to the proper determination of each proposition, and a citation of the authorities relied on to maintain the validity or correctness of the propositions thus asserted, and should not include inferences and deductions either from the authorities cited or from matters stated in the record, but such inferences and deductions should be presented to the court by an oral, written, or printed argument. Shanks v. Carroll, 50 Tex. 17, 20.

The word "brief" is synonymous in law with "points and authorities," being a condensed statement of the propositions of law which counsel desire to establish, indicating the reasons and authorities which sustain them. Duncan v. Kohler, 34 N. W. 594, 595, 37 Minn. 379.

A mere statement of the opinion of counsel is not a brief, and where such a statement is filed by appellant the court is warranted in affirming the judgment without examination of the merits. Haberlaw v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co., 73 Ill. App. 261.

A brief cannot be treated as an assignment of errors, for a brief is an abridged statement of the party's case—a summary of the points or questions in issue. In general legal usage a brief is in no sense a pleading. It contains a statement of the facts shown by the record, and the points, authorities, and arguments relied upon to sustain the contention presented for consideration. Lamy v. Lamy, 12 Pac. 650, 4 N. M. (Johns.) 43.

BRIEF STATEMENT.

A "brief statement" is a substitute for a special plea, and, where it purports to give notice of matter which is a full answer to the plaintiff's declaration, it should contain all the substantial elements of a special plea. Precision and exactness are not necessary, but substance is essential. Folsom v. Brawn, 25 N. H. (5 Fost.) 114, 120.

The term "brief statement" conveys the idea of a short notice, without formal or full statements, of the matters relied upon. Such brief statement cannot prevent either party from offering testimony appropriate under the general issue. Nor can the omission of a denial, in a brief statement, of some matter alleged in the statement, control or decide the effect of testimony properly received under it. Such brief statement appears to have been considered as amounting to little more than notice of special matter to be given in evidence under it. Trask v. Patterson, 29 Me. 499, 502 (citing Potter v. Titcomb, 18 Me. 36).

BRIEFLY.

The statute relating to contested elections, and providing that the person wishing to contest an election might give notice in writing to the persons whose election he intends to contest, "stating the cause of such contest briefly," means stating the fact which gives rise to the right to contest, or constituting the ground of such contest. To do this briefly, certainty is required, but not technical precision of averment, and only that degree of certainty in the statement of facts as will serve to notify the adverse party of the particular cause upon which the contest is founded. Whitney v. Blackburn, 21 Pac. 874, 876, 17 Or. 564, 11 Am. St. Rep. 857.

Under a statute requiring a recognizance to briefly state the nature of the offense, it is held that a recognizance which gives the name of the offense is a sufficient compliance with the statute. State v. Birchim, 9 Nev. 95, 99, 100.

BRING.

"Bringing," as used in Rev. St. La. § 1010, authorizing the bringing of a person accused of crime before the district judge, includes an application of the state for a preliminary examination of the accused person, formally made to the judge. State ex rel. Attorney General v. Brunot, 28 South. 996, 997, 104 La. 237.

An allegation, in an affidavit for an appeal, that the appeal was not "brought for delay," should be construed as synonymous with the allegation that it was not "intended for delay," as used in the statute requiring the affidavit to allege that it was not intended for delay. New Brunswick Steamboat & Canal Transp. Co. v. Baldwin, 14 N. J. Law (2 J. S. Green) 440, 442.

Though a writ is issued or a suit is instituted for some purposes at the time it becomes a perfected process, and though the service of the writ is sometimes the commencement of the suit, the mere making a writ or petition, without summons or citation, and signed by no magistrate or judicial authority, will not constitute the commencement of the suit or the "bringing of the petition or bill." Consequently, where petition for divorce was made and dated prior to the expiration of two years' required residence of the plaintiff, but the summons and order of notice by publication were not signed by the clerk and issued until after the expiration of the two years, the petition or bill could not be said to have been prematurely brought within the meaning of the statute. Blain v. Blain, 45 Vt. 538, 543.

In reference to actions.

To "bring an action" has a settled customary legal, as well as general, meaning, and refers to the initiation of legal proceedings in a suit. Hames v. Judd, 18 Civ. Proc. R. 324, 325, 9 N. Y. Supp. 743.

A suit is "brought" at the time it is commenced. Rawle v. Phelps (U. S.) 20 Fed. Cas. 320, 321.

A suit is "brought" when in law it is commenced, and there is no significance in the fact that in the legislation of Congress on the subject of limitations the word "commenced" is sometimes used, and at other times the word "brought." In this connection the two words evidently mean the same thing, and are used interchangeably. Goldenberg v. Murphy, 2 Sup. Ct. 388, 389, 108 U. S. 162, 27 L. Ed. 686; Kaiser v. Illinois Cent. R. Co. (U. S.) 6 Fed. 1, 4; United States v. American Lumber Co. (U. S.) 80 Fed. 309, 315.

"Brought," used in connection with a suit brought, means instituted, commenced. Berger v. Douglas County Com'rs (U. S.) 5 Fed. 23, 26.

Act March 3, 1875, § 5, authorizes the removal to the federal Circuit Court of a suit "brought" by a state in its own courts where the suit arises under the Constitution and laws of the United States. Held, that a suit is not "brought" within such section until the defendant has submitted himself to the jurisdiction of the court, and hence, where the case stood on the summons and an alleged service, the complaint, the special appearance of the company for the purposes of its motion to vacate the services, and a petition for removal, there was no suit brought within the meaning of the statute, it not being certain that the defendant was legally within the jurisdiction of the court. Germania Life Ins. Co. v. Wisconsin, 7 Sup. Ct. 260, 262, 119 U. S. 473, 30 L. Ed. 461.

The word "brought," as used in a statute relating to actions brought for the support of a pauper, is not inappropriate to designate an action which had been commenced at any time before the trial, and it does not necessarily designate one commenced after the action or trial was commenced. Inhabitants of Bangor v. Inhabitants of Brunswick, 33 Me. 352, 355.

"Brought," when used in the term "action brought" or "writ brought," means "obtained" or "gotten," and signifies the same as "sued out," because the plaintiffs made suit or secta to the King, to the Chancellor, or to the clerk, as in different ages the practice altered and obtained; not a mere blank form as we use, but a writ filled up with the dates, terms, etc., ready for service, like only the writs we now obtain from the clerks, as writs of execution filled up, and hence, when thus obtained, they are properly said to be "sued out." By the procurement of a blank form from the clerk or an attorney, an action is not "brought," such form not being a writ, though by procurement of such a form, suitably filled up and intended to be served, the writ or action may be called "commenced," "sued out," or, in the language of statutes, "brought." Society for Propagating the Gospel v. Whitcomb, 2 N. H. 227, 229.

A suit may be "prosecuted" after it has been begun, but the "bringing of a suit" is its initiation. The one phrase applies to the further conduct of a suit, and the other to the beginning of a new suit. Buecker v. Carr, 47 Atl. 34, 36, 60 N. J. Eq. 300.

Code Civ. Proc. § 3268, relating to security for costs, provides that defendant may require such security "in an action brought in a court of record." Held, that the word "brought," as used in this section, signifies "begun," or "commenced." The phrase "to bring an action" has a settled customary legal meaning, as well as a general meaning, and refers to the initiation of legal proceedings. The fact that the word "commenced" is used in the same section as applied to the beginning of an action does not conflict with this view, since the two expressions, "brought" and "commenced," mean the same thing. The word "brought" has never been used as synonymous with "removed" in cases of removal of actions from one court to another, and therefore the removal of an action cannot be held to be its commencement within such section. Hames v. Judd, 9 N. Y. Supp. 743, 744, note.

The bringing of a suit may be by retaining the attorney for the purpose, either alone or in conjunction with others, or recognizing a retainer made by an assumed agent, or actually engaging to defray the expenses of a nominal plaintiff retaining an attorney in his own name; he alone being liable to the attorney in the first instance. Whitney v. Cooper (N. Y.) 1 Hill, 629, 633.

An action is "brought," within the statute authorizing entry of a rule of reference after suit brought, after the defendant makes his appearance, which is not until bail filed. Hertzog v. Ellis, 3 Bin. 209, 212.

In reference to criminal proceedings.

Criminal proceedings cannot be said to be "brought" until a formal charge is openly made against accused, either by indictment presented or information filed in court, or, at least, by complaint before a magistrate. The mere submission of a bill of indictment to the grand jury and the examination of witnesses do not constitute the bringing of a charge. Post v. United States, 16 Sup. Ct. 611, 613, 161 U. S. 583, 40 L. Ed. 816.

In reference to certiorari or writ of error.

A writ of certiorari is not "brought," within the meaning of Code 1882, § 2920, providing that such a writ must be brought within three months after judgment, until it is filed in the clerk's office. Hilt v. Young, 43 S. E. 76, 77, 116 Ga. 708 (citing Barrett v. Devine, 60 Ga. 632).

A writ of error is not "brought," in the legal meaning of the term, until it is filed in the court which rendered the judgment. Stevens v. Clark (U. S.) 62 Fed. 321, 324, 10 C. C. A. 379 (citing Brooks v. Norris, 52 U. S. [11 How.] 204, 13 L. Ed. 685); Credit Co. v. Arkansas Cent. Ry. Co., 9 Sup. Ct. 107, 128 U. S. 258, 32 L. Ed. 448; Scarborough v. Pargoud, 2 Sup. Ct. 877, 878, 108 U. S. 567, 27 L. Ed. 824.

"Brought," as applied to writs of error, means the issuance of the writ by proper authority, and the filing of the same in the proper court, and is used synonymously in the statutes of the United States, in the decisions of the courts, and in the text-books with "sued out." City of Waxahachie v. Color (U. S.) 92 Fed. 284, 286, 34 C. C. A. 349.

BRING IN.

"Bring in," as used in a statute prohibiting any master of a vessel from bringing in any negro, mulatto, or any other person of color into the country, seems to indicate, and is most commonly employed as indicating, the action of a person on anything, animate or inanimate, which is itself passive. It is true that a vessel coming into port is the vehicle which brings in her crew, but we do not in common language say that the mariners were brought in by a particular person. We rather say that they brought in the vessel, and the words to "bring in" or "import" are particularly applicable to persons not concerned in the navigation of the vessel, so that the statute does not apply to colored seamen employed in navigating such ship or vessel. Wilson v. United States (U. S.) 30 Fed. Cas. 239, 244.

As import or enter.

When the subject is persons, "importing" and "bringing in" are synonymous terms. No distinction can be made in the law between the "importation" of persons and "bringing in" of persons. United States v. Pagliano (U. S.) 53 Fed. 1001, 1003.

Rev. St. § 2164, Act July 5, 1884, c. 220, § 11, 23 Stat. 117 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1310], making it a crime to "bring into the United States" any Chinese person not lawfully entitled to enter, does not refer to persons already within the United States, or to persons who arrive on a vessel from a port or place out of the United States. United States v. Wilson (U. S.) 60 Fed. 890, 894.

The revenue laws use the words "to import," "to bring in," "to introduce," as synonymous. Thus the act of August 30, 1842, § 19 (5 Stat. 565), "If any person shall knowingly and willfully with intent to defraud the revenue smuggle or clandestinely introduce into the United States," the act of July 18, 1886, § 4 (14 Stat. 179), "If any person shall fraudulently or knowingly import or bring into the United States," etc.; and there are many others. Under these statutes smuggling or bringing in or introducing goods has been held by both the Circuit and District Courts for a long course of years to be proved by evidence of a secret landing of goods without paying or securing the duties. United States v. Jordan (U. S.) 26 Fed. Cas. 661, 662.

"Brought in," as used in a verdict in an action for forfeitures under the customs revenue laws that the goods were "brought in with intent to defraud the United States," is equivalent to an allegation that the acts alleged in the information were done with fraudulent intent, as required to be specially found by 18 Stat. 189, as "brought in" may be fairly construed as having reference to entering or attempting to enter by the means specified. Origet v. United States, 8 Sup. Ct. 846, 849, 125 U. S. 240, 31 L. Ed. 743.

As present.

"Brought in," as used in a statute giving the orphans' court the power to decree that all creditors of an estate of a deceased person who have not brought in their claims shall be barred from any action thereon against an executor and administrator, except, etc., means not presented in writing, with the formalities and under the oath required by statute to make the bringing in of a claim effectual. Newbold v. Fenimore, 21 Atl. 939, 940, 53 N. J. Law (24 Vroom) 307.

BRING OUT.

"Bringing out a boat" is a common phrase among boatmen. It is usually applied to the building of a new boat. It may also be understood as applying to a boat newly repaired, or newly brought out when merely laid up for the sea. Madison County Coal Co. v. The Colona, 36 Mo. 446, 449.

BRING UP.

Child.

A will directing that the expenses of educating a legatee and bringing him up to maturity shall be paid out of that part of the testator's estate given to the legatee does not show that the testator intends that the legatee shall only be clothed and fed, "but doubtless intended that his bringing up should include an education according to the inclination and capacities and suited to his situation and circumstances in life." Condict's Ex'rs v. King, 13 N. J. Eq. (2 Beasl.) 375, 380.

Within the meaning of a will providing that a legatee should educate and bring up the testator's daughter, the expression "bring up" requires personal, parental care, as well as furnishing subsistence to the daughter. Merrill v. Emery, 27 Mass. (10 Pick.) 507.

Transcript of record.

A certificate of the clerk of the Supreme Court that the transcript of a record has not been "brought up" within the time fixed is equivalent to a certificate that the transcript has not been filed within that time. Champomier v. Washington, 2 La. Ann. 1013.

BRINGING MONEY INTO COURT.

"Bringing money into court," says Bouvier, is the act of depositing money in the hands of the public officers of the court for the purpose of satisfying a debt or duty, and, as a clerk of the court is a proper custodian of moneys paid into court, his reception of money under an order to referees to sell certain land as produced by law, and bring the proceeds into court, is done in his official capacity. Dirks v. Juel, 80 N. W. 1045, 1046, 59 Neb. 353.

BRISK WIND.

The words "brisk wind" include a wind blowing at the rate of 22 miles an hour. The Snap (U. S.) 24 Fed. 292, 293.

BRISTLINGS.

"Bristlings" are the young of the herring, a family distinct from that to which the sardines belong. In re Wieland (U. S.) 98 Fed. 99, 100.

BRITISH.

Act March 3, 1813, which provides that it shall be lawful for any person or persons to sink, burn, or destroy any "British armed vessel of war" during the present war, was construed to include vessels which belong to the British navy, and used for hostile purposes, being armed with muskets, pikes, cutlass, etc. Parlin v. United States, 1 Ct. Cl. 174, 176.

BRITISH BRIG.

The description of a vessel in a marine policy as a "British brig" does not imply that the vessel is a British registered vessel, but simply that she is owned by a British subject. Mackie v. Pleasants, 2 Bln. 363, 372.

BRITISH SEAMEN.

The expression "British seamen" in Merchants Shipping Act, § 267, may properly mean one who, whatever his nationality, is serving on board a British ship, for whenever a ship bears a nation's flag it is to be treated as a part of the territory of that nation, a ship being regarded as a kind of a floating island, and, though the ship might float into the territory of another nation, that would not prevent the country whose flag she bore from legislating in regard to the conduct of sailors on board her, so as to give the courts of such country jurisdiction of crimes committed on board the ship, though within the jurisdiction of a foreign port; and therefore, though a defendant charged with crime be an American citizen, yet, where he embarks by his own consent on board a British ship as a part of the crew, he must be considered as being within British jurisdiction. Ross v. McIntyre, 11 Sup. Ct. 897, 904, 905, 140 U. S. 453, 35 L. Ed. 581.

BRITISH WEIGHT.

The words "British weight," in a charter party, if it appears from the evidence to have two meanings, one referring to gross weight and the other net weight, creates a latent ambiguity, and parol evidence is admissible to show the meaning of the term in commercial usage. Bulow v. Goddard (S. C.) 1 Nott & McC. 45, 51, 9 Am. Dec. 663.

BROAD-TIRED WAGON.

"Broad-tired wagon," as used in St. 1889 (Acts 1889, p. 378; Burns' Ann. St. 1894, § 2047; Horner's Ann. St. 1897, § 6600), making it an offense to haul over turnpikes and gravel roads in specified weather loads of more than 2,500 pounds in a "broad-tired wagon," is not a technical phrase having a peculiar and appropriate meaning in law, but is to be taken in its plain, or ordinary and usual, sense, which means a wagon having wheels with tires which are broad. If tires of particular widths be compared, it is easy to say which is comparatively narrow and which is comparatively broad, but without any prescribed standard it is impossible to say, as a matter of law, that a tire two inches wide is certainly either a narrow tire or a broad tire. The meanings of the separate words in the phrase "narrow-tired wagon" is plain, but the word "broad" describes not certain, but uncertain, comparative widths, and, no standard of comparison being provided by the law, it renders the phrase in which it occurs uncertain and indefinite. A particular tire may be broad or narrow according to the width of another tire or other tires of different widths with which for the occasion it is being compared. Cook v. State, 59 N. E. 489, 491, 26 Ind. App. 278.

See "Break."

Where, on a trial of a prosecution for burglary, the court charged "if the brick walls of the building were in the nighttime broken and any entry made into the walls so broken," the language should be construed as meaning "if the walls were broken through, and the entry made into the walls so broken." Commonwealth v. Glover, 111 Mass. 395, 403.

BROKEN DOWN.

The term "broken down in his loins," when used in reference to a horse, means that the horse is so feeble in the rear part of his back that his usefulness and value are greatly impaired. In such case he can neither carry nor draw such burdens as sound horses ordinarily do, and the fact that he is in such a condition is a breach of a warranty of soundness. State v. Sherrill, 95 N. C. 663, 665.

BROKEN GRANITE.

The words "broken granite," as used in a specification for public improvements, would include only small pieces or fragments, and the meaning intended is also to be gathered from the context. These small pieces or fragments of granite are to be used in the making of concrete, and the making and use of concrete for pavements have become so common that the public generally are familiar with them, and the apparent meaning of an ordinance providing that the broken granite shall pass through rings of a certain size is that such broken pieces shall not be larger than a certain size. Gage v. City of Chicago, 66 N. E. 374, 376, 201 Ill. 93.

As agent, see "Agent."

A broker is an agent employed to make bargains and contracts between other persons in matters of trade and commerce or navigation, for a compensation commonly called "brokerage." Arey, 27 Me. (14 Shep.) 362, 364; Pott v. Turner, 6 Bing. 702, 706. He is a mere negotiator between other parties, and never acts in his own name, but in the name of those who employ him. effectuate the business which he has in hand. Milliken v. Woodward, 45 Atl. 796, 798, 64 N. J. Law, 444. The duty of a broker consists in bringing the minds of the vendor and vendee to an agreement. He must produce a purchaser ready and willing to enter into a contract on the employer's terms. Condit v. Cowdrey, 5 N. Y. Supp. 187, 188, 57 N. Y. Super Ct. (25 Jones & S.) 66. He is a person whose business it is to bring the buyer and seller together. He may or may not be concerned in negotiating the bargain, and he therefore becomes entitled to his compensation when he procures for his principal a party with whom the principal is satisfied, and who actually contracts for the purchase or sale of the property at a price acceptable to the owner. Keys v. Johnson, 68 Pa. (18 P. F. Smith) 42.

Lord Chief Baron Comy, N. S., of the Court of Exchequer, in his Digest of the Laws of England, defines "brokers" to be persons employed among merchants to make contracts between them and fix the exchange for payment of wares sold or bought. See Comy's Dig. 78. Burrill, in his Law Dictionary, describes a "broker" as one who makes a bargain for another, and receives a commission for so doing. An agent employed among merchants and others to make contracts between them in matters of trade. Tindale, C. J., Ring, 702, 706. An agent employed among merchants and others to make contracts between them for a commission, commonly called "brokerage." A broker is not generally authorized to act or contract in his own name, nor is he intrusted with the possession of what he is employed to sell, or empowered to take possession of what he is employed to purchase, but he acts merely as a middleman or negotiator between the parties, and in those respects he is distinguished from a "factor." The earliest definition of this term "broker" confined the employment of brokers to dealings between merchant and merchant. Thus, by the statute, 1, § 1, c. 21, "brokers" are described to be persons employed by merchants English, and merchant strangers, in contriving, making, and concluding bargains and contracts between them concerning their wares and merchandise and moneys to be taken up by exchange between such merchants and merchant tradesmen. Russell on Fact. These definitions, however appropriate at a period when merchandise and exchange brokers appear to have constituted the only classes of this description of agents, have been properly regarded by modern writers as too limited to include the various classes of brokers recognized at the present day. Bouvier says that brokers are those who are engaged for others in the negotiations of contracts relative to property, with the custody of which they have no concern. Webster defines a "broker" as: "(1) One who transacts business for another; an agent. (2) An agent employed to effect bargains and contracts, as a middleman or negotiator, between other persons for a compensation commonly called 'brokerage.' He takes no possession, as broker, of the subject-matter of the negotiation. He generally contracts in the name of those who employ him, and not in his own." City of Little Rock v. Barton, 33 Ark. 436, 437, 444.

A "broker" is defined as follows: "Every person, firm, etc., excepting such as hold a license as a banker, whose business it is as a broker to negotiate purchases or sales of stock, exchange, etc., or other securities." Act 1864, § 79, subd. 9, 13 Stat. 223, amended by Act March 3, 1865, 13 Stat. 469. United States v. Fisk (U. S.) 25 Fed. Cas. 1089, 1090.

The words "bank," "banker," "broker," "stockjobber," when used in the revenue act, shall be construed to include whoever has money employed in the business of dealing in coin, notes, or bills of exchange, or in the business of dealing in or buying or selling any kinds of bills of exchange, checks, drafts, bank notes, promissory notes, bonds, or other writing obligatory of stock of any kind or description whatsoever, or receiving money on deposit. Hurd's Rev. St. Ill. 1901, p. 1493, c. 120, § 292, subd. 3.

As agent of both parties.

Any party buying or selling coupon bonds shall be deemed a "broker" within the meaning of the license laws of this state. Code Va. 1887, § 402.

A broker is primarily the agent of the person who first employs him. Illingworth v. De Mott, 45 Atl. 272, 279, 59 N. J. Eq. 8.

Every person, firm, or company whose business it is to negotiate purchases or sales of stocks, bonds, exchange, bullion, coined money, bank notes, promissory notes, or other securities for themselves or others, shall be regarded as a "broker" within the meaning of the war revenue act of 1898. U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 2287.

It is only when making sales and purchases in his business, his trade, his profession, his means of getting his living, or of making his fortune, that he becomes a "broker" within the meaning of the statute requiring brokers to pay certain duties on sales made by them; nor is it believed that a sale, by one doing a banking business, of a security received by him for repayment of a legitimate loan, would make him a broker. This would not be deemed an act of brokerage, either under the statute or on general principles of law. Warren v. Shook, 91 U. S. 704, 710, 23 L. Ed. 421.

One who does not make bargains for others, but buys and sells on his own account, or with his own funds, or on the account and with the funds of his principals, is not a broker. The city charter of Portland, which authorizes the mayor and common council to license, tax, and regulate brokers, does not embrace the power to regulate or license the sale of bills of exchange, when the business is transacted by persons on their own account and with their own funds. City of Portland v. O'Neill, 1 Or. 218, 219.

A broker is one who is engaged for others in the negotiation of contracts relative to property with the custody of which they have no concern. It is essential that a broker act for some other party, and a person transacting business for himself cannot be a broker. Gast v. Buckley (Ky.) 64 S. W. 632, 633.

Brokers are of many kinds, the most important being enumerated as follows: Exchange brokers, insurance brokers, note brokers, real estate brokers, ship brokers, stock brokers, and merchandise brokers. Ayres v. Thomas, 47 Pac. 1013, 116 Cal. 140.

The business of a broker is to serve as a connecting link between the party who is to be insured and the party who is to do the insuring—to bring about "the meeting of their minds" which is necessary to the consummation of the contract. In the discharge of his business he is the representative of both parties to a certain extent. Domat thus defines his functions: "The engagement of a broker is like that of a proxy, a factor, or other agent, but with this difference: that, the broker being employed by persons who have opposite interests to manage, he is, as it were, agent of both to negotiate the commerce and affair in which he concerns himself. Thus his engagement is twofold, and consists in being faithful to all the parties in the execution of what every one of them intrusts him with. And his power is not to treat, but to explain the intentions of both parties, and to negotiate in such a manner as to put those who employ him in a condition to treat together personally." 1 Pom. (Strahan's Translation) bk. 1 tit. 17, § 1. Story says this statement of the functions of a broker is "a full and exact description according to the sense of our law." Story, (9th Ed.) p. 31, note 3. Hooper v. People of State of California, 15 Sup. Ct. 207, 211, 155 U. S. 648, 39 L. Ed. 297.

A broker is, strictly, a middleman or intermediate negotiator between the parties. He is primarily deemed merely the agent of the parties by whom he is employed, and he becomes the agent of the other party only when the bargain or contract is definitely settled as to its terms between the principal. As a general proposition, the same individual cannot be agent for both parties, but persons having undertaken certain duties of a particular character, are treated as agents of both parties; such are brokers. Hinckley v. Arey, 27 Me. (14 Shep.) 362, 364.

The broker or intermediary is he who is employed to negotiate a matter between two parties, and who for that reason is considered as the mandatory of both. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 3016.

Auctioneer distinguished.

A broker is a person who makes a private bargain between other persons, but not a public one. He is described as a person who makes bargains between merchant and merchant. He also both buys and sells. A broker is essentially different from an auctioneer, who only sells. Wilkes v. Ellis, 2 H. Bl. 555.

Authority.

A broker "is a special agent, and derives his power and authority to bind his principal from the instructions given him by his principal. When definite instructions are given by the principal to the broker to sell goods for him at a certain specified price for a certain time and day only, this will not authorize the broker to contract and sell the same kind of goods at a different and subsequent time for the same price. His power is limited by and ceases with his instructions, and this is so even though it had been usual, in the course of dealings between the broker and his principal, for the broker to continue to sell at the price quoted last by the principal." Clark v. Cumming, 77 Ga. 64, 67, 4 Am. St. Rep. 72.

The authorities denominate a "broker" as a middleman, the go-between to perfect an understanding between the contracting parties, and he is not necessarily the agent of either party. When employed by a party to do a particular thing, he is primarily that party's agent, and ordinarily the party with whom he deals must take notice of the authority given him by his principal. Jackson v. Butler, 51 S. W. 1095, 1096, 21 Tex. Civ. App. 379.

In Morris v. Ruddy, 20 N. J. Eq. (5 C. E. Green) 236, it is said that brokers are persons employed to effect sales. Their general business is only to bring the parties together. But with regard to merchandise it is held that they have the power to bind the principal by their signature to written memorandums of sale, known as "bought and sold notes," in sales within the statute of frauds. Keim v. Lindley (N. J.) 30 Atl. 1063, 1070.

Banker distinguished.

See "Banker."

Clerk distinguished.

A broker is one who is employed to negotiate a matter between two parties, and who for that reason is the mandatory of both. Rev. Civ. Code, art. 3016. The leading and essential difference between a "clerk" and a "broker" is that the former hires his services exclusively to one person, while the latter is employed to make bargains and contracts between other persons in matters of trade, commerce, and navigation. For the services of the former there is a fixed stated salary, while for those of the latter a compensation commonly styled "brokerage" is allowed. Thus, under an agreement that a person shall sell all the sugar and molasses consigned to a third person and no other, and shall receive for his services a stated salary, such person was a clerk, and not a broker. Tete v. Lanau, 14 South. 241, 243, 45 La. Ann. 1343.

Commission merchant distinguished.

A commission merchant is one who buys or sells goods or merchandise, consigned or delivered to him by his principal, for a compensation, commonly called "commission." He differs from a broker in that he may buy or sell in his own name, and very frequently does, without disclosing the name of his principal; while the broker has no right to buy or sell except in the name of his principal. The commission merchant is intrusted with the management, control, or disposition of the goods to be bought or sold, and he has a special property in them, and a lien upon them for his share, advance, or commission. The broker is he who negotiates the purchase or sale for the principal. He has no control of the property. Edwards v. Hoefflinghoff (U. S.) 38 Fed. 635, 641.

Factor distinguished.

A broker is an agent of his employer, and differs from a factor in that he does not ordinarily have the possession of the property which he is employed to sell, and his contracts are always made in the name of his employer. Delafield v. Smith, 78 N. W. 170, 173, 101 Wis. 664, 70 Am. St. Rep. 938.

A broker differs from a factor in some very important particulars, as he is not intrusted with the possession, management, control, and disposal of the goods to be bought or sold, and consequently has no special property therein, as has a factor. Graham v. Duckwall, 71 Ky. (8 Bush) 12, 16; Price v. Wisconsin Marine Fire Ins. Co., 43 Wis. 267, 269, 276, 277; Slack v. Tucker, 90 U. S. (23 Wall.) 321, 23 L. Ed. 143; American Sugar Refining Co. v. McGhee, 21 S. E. 383, 386, 96 Ga. 27; Graham v. Duckwall, 71 Ky. (8 Bush.) 12; Butler v. Dorman, 68 Mo. 298, 300, 30 Am. Rep. 795.

A factor is one who sells the property of others when he has such property in his possession, while a broker negotiates contracts relative to property, and makes sales of the same, when he has no custody of the property. Braun v. City of Chicago, 110 Ill. 186, 194.

A broker is one who negotiates contracts relative to property, and makes sales of the same, when he has no custody of the property; while a factor sells the property of others when he has such property in his possession. Braun v. City of Chicago, 110 Ill. 186, 194; American Sugar Refining Co. v. McGhee, 21 S. E. 383, 386, 96 Ga. 27.

Mr. Justice Bradley in Slack v. Tucker, 90 U. S. (23 Wall.) 321, 330, 23 L. Ed. 143, says the difference between a factor or commission merchant and a broker is stated by all the books to be this: A factor may buy and sell in his own name, and he has the goods in his possession, where a broker, as such, cannot ordinarily buy or sell in his own name, and has no possession of the goods sold. Thus in Story, Ag. § 28, it is said the true definition of a "broker" seems to be that he is an agent employed to make bargains and contracts between other persons in matters of trade; that he is strictly, therefore, a middleman or intermediate negotiator between the parties. The authority of a merchandise broker, under his general powers as such, is quite limited, and he has no authority to rescind a contract of sale received from the purchaser of goods the bill of lading indorsed by him and thus obtain possession of the goods from the carrier, nor does he have power to direct to whom the goods shall be delivered. American Sugar Refining Co. v. McGhee, 21 S. E. 383, 386, 96 Ga. 27.

Insurance agent.

The term "broker," as used in General Incorporation Act, art. 5, § 1, par. 91, authorizing municipal corporations organized under the act to license brokers, does not include insurance agents representing corporations, and hence the statute does not authorize the licensing of such agents. "The term 'broker' or 'insurance broker' is generally understood to mean a person who owes no duty or allegiance to any particular corporation," while an insurance agent representing a corporation owes such duty and allegiance to the corporation so represented. McKinney v. City of Alton, 41 Ill. App. 508, 512.

Pawnbroker.

A pawnbroker is a "broker" within § Geo. II, c. 30, § 39. Rawlinson v. Pearson, 5 Barn. & Adol. 124.

The word "broker" is derived from the Anglo-Saxon word signifying to use, and primarily means an agent. It means in law a middleman or negotiator between other persons for a compensation, called "brokerage," who takes no possession of the subject-matter of negotiations, and usually contracts in the name of those employing him, and not in his own name; and sometimes it means in ordinary speech a dealer in money, notes, bills of exchange, etc., but will not include a pawnbroker. Schau v. City of Charlotte, 24 S. E. 526, 527, 118 N. C. 733.

Possession of goods.

A broker is an intermediate agent negotiating between buyer and seller, and as broker he is not entitled to the possession of the property which is the subject of sale or purchase, nor does he receive or pay the price unless he is authorized so to do. Morgan v. Jaudon, 40 How. Prac. 366, 378; City of Little Rock v. Barton, 33 Ark. 436, 437, 444; Gast v. Buckley, 64 S. W. 632, 633; Northrup v. Shook (U. S.) 18 Fed. Cas. 375, 379; Braun v. City of Chicago, 110 Ill. 186, 194.

When a broker is employed to buy or sell goods he is not intrusted with the custody or possession of them, and is not authorized to buy or sell them in his own name. He is a middleman, and for some purpose is treated as agent for both parties. When he is employed to buy and sell goods it is customary for him to give the buyer a note of the sale called a "solid note," and to the seller a like note called a "bought note," in his own name as agent of each party, whereby they are respectively bound if he has not exceeded his authority. Saladin v. Mitchell, 45 Ill. 79, 83.

A broker is not authorized to buy or sell property in his own name, but in the name of his principal. He is not intrusted with the custody or possession of the property bought or sold, and consequently has no special lien thereon. Edgerton v. Michels, 26 N. W. 748, 750, 68 Wis. 124.

Stockbroker.

By Ordinances of Chicago, § 214, a "broker" is one who, for commission or other compensation, is engaged in selling or negotiating the sale of goods, wares, merchandise, produce, or grain belonging to others, and thus includes brokers who deal in stocks, bonds, and securities, sometimes known as "stockbrokers." Banta v. City of Chicago, 50 N. E. 233, 237, 172 Ill. 204, 40 L. R. A. 611.

The earlier authorities defined "broker" as one employed by merchants English and merchants stranger in contriving and concluding bargains and contracts between them concerning their wares and merchandise and the moneys to be taken up by exchange between such merchants and traders. Com. Dig. "Merchant," "C." Gradually, however, the word came to be employed as embracing those dealing with the affairs of others than merchants domestic and merchants foreign, and eventually to include the handling of indebtedness and capital stock of corporations. This later became known as "stock brokerage." Gradually, also, the rule that a broker could not buy or sell in his own name became subject to exceptions. Edw.

Brok. & F. 1870, § 109, says: "A broker is at liberty to buy in his own name, if such be the custom among brokers." Mr. Story, in his work on Agency (section 109), says: "There are exceptions by the usages of trade to the rule that a broker cannot make a contract in his own name." Russ. Fact. p. 52, says: "Brokers may contract in their own name if the usual course of dealing warrants them to do so." The same authors also recognize exceptions to the rule that a broker could pay the purchase price of goods bought or receive the price of those sold. A stockbroker is defined as a broker "who, for a commission, attends to the purchase and sale of stocks or shares, and of government or other security, in behalf and for the account of clients." His functions are recognized as broader than those of the ordinary broker, since he is intrusted with the possession of the property concerning which he acts, and may even take and transfer them without the name of his principal appearing in the transaction. Under this statement of the law a definition of a "broker" in an ordinance as one who, for a commission or other compensation, is engaged in selling or negotiating the sale of goods, wares and merchandise, produce or grain, belonging to others, includes stockbrokers, though they have possession of the goods which they sell and buy, and though the transactions are completed in their own name, those for whom they were really acting not appearing at all. Banta v. City of Chicago, 50 N. E. 233, 235, 172 Ill. 204, 40 L. R. A. 611.

BROKERAGE.

See "Marriage Brokerage."

"Brokerage" is the name used to designate compensation for brokers' services. Graham v. Duckwall, 71 Ky. (8 Bush) 12, 16; City of Little Rock v. Barton, 33 Ark. 436, 437, 444; Tete v. Lanoux, 14 South. 241, 243, 45 La. Ann. 1343; Stratford v. City Council of Montgomery, 110 Ala. 619, 20 South. 127, 128; Adkins v. City of Richmond, 34 S. E. 967, 968, 98 Va. 91, 47 L. R. A. 533, 81 Am. St. Rep. 705; Schaul v. City of Charlotte, 24 S. E. 526, 527, 118 N. C. 733; Saladin v. Mitchell, 45 Ill. 79, 83; Murray v. Doud, 47 N. E. 717, 718, 167 Ill. 368, 59 Am. St. Rep. 297; United States v. Fisk (U. S.) 25 Fed. Cas. 1089, 1090.

The word "brokerage," in a request for an instruction that if defendant agreed to pay plaintiff brokerage, and that such promise was made after all services rendered had been performed, plaintiff is not entitled to recover, was used in its ordinary and common acceptance as equivalent to "compensation for services rendered," and not in the strict legal definition of the term. Myers v. Dean, 32 N. Y. Supp. 237, 238, 11 Misc. Rep. 368.

Where a contract entitled plaintiff to recover only in case he had earned "broker's commissions," he could not recover by merely proving that he procured and submitted to defendant a list of properties for sale, which included the property which was finally exchanged by defendant for the property which he had employed the broker to sell. Wyckoff v. Bissell, 48 N. Y. Supp. 1018, 1019, 24 App. Div. 66.

Where the owner of property employs a broker to find a purchaser, and agrees to compensate him therefor, the consideration is known as "brokerage commission." The very essence of a brokerage commission is success. It is dependent upon the securing of a satisfactory purchaser and the consummation of the deal, and, no matter how much time may be devoted to finding a customer, or how little, the element of success alone will determine whether he is entitled to compensation. The promise to pay if a customer is found to purchase at a stated price is not the ordinary contract of employment, but it is generally in the nature of an offer to pay a commission if a person is produced who buys at a price named. This offer may be withdrawn at any time, provided the work done has not brought the person within the terms of the offer, and where the broker has been unsuccessful he is not entitled to recover on a quantum meruit for work done. In Dowling v. Morrill, 43 N. E. 295, 165 Mass. 491, it was held that where a broker has done work, but another broker closed the trade, he could not recover on a quantum meruit for work done, but that a commission was earned if his work was in fact the efficient and predominating cause of the sale. Where a broker is discharged before producing a purchaser at the terms authorized, he has not completed his contract, and is not entitled to commission. Cadigan v. Crabtree, 61 N. E. 37, 38, 179 Mass. 474, 55 L. R. A. 77, 88 Am. St. Rep. 397.

BROMO.

The word "bromo," as used in the name of bromo-quinine claimed as a trade-mark for a medicinal preparation, is one of description, and not a coined word, and was used for the purpose of inducing the belief that bromine was a leading constituent in its compound. The Standard Dictionary states that the word "bromo" is derived from bromine, and is a combined word, used mostly in names of chemical compounds in which bromine is a principal element. Paris Medicine Co. v. W. H. Hill Co. (U. S.) 102 Fed. 148, 152, 42 C. C. A. 227.

BROMO-CAFFEINE.

"As applied to a preparation composed of bromide of potassium and other ingredients, the term is descriptive of the general composition and characteristics of the article to which it is attached, so that a trade-mark cannot be acquired in such a name." Keasbey v. Brooklyn Chemical Works, 21 N. Y. Supp. 696, 67 Hun, 648.

BROOK.

The word "brook," when used in a deed to describe the boundary of land, will, in the absence of evidence that the parties did not use the word according to its ordinary signification, be construed to mean the main brook, although the brook has a main and auxiliary channel; and this is true, even though the boundary is thus made to include an island in the stream. Pike v. Hood, 27 Atl. 139, 67 N. H. 171.

BROTHER.

See, also, "Sister."

A statute providing that if any person shall die intestate, having title to any estate or inheritance, and shall leave no children or their legal representatives, such estate shall pass to the "brothers and sisters" of the intestate, means the whole stock or class of brothers and sisters, so that a brother or sister born at any period subsequent to the death of the intestate is entitled to share equally with those then in being. "The term imports all the brothers and sisters, and cannot be limited to those living at any particular period." Springer v. Fortune (Ohio) 2 Cin. R. 52, 53.

Brother of the half blood.

Webster defines the word "brother" to mean "a male person who has the same father and mother with another person, or who has one of them." The term "brothers and sisters" held to include brothers and sisters of the half blood, in a statute relating to descent of property. Anderson v. Bell, 140 Ind. 375, 379, 39 N. E. 735, 736, 29 L. R. A. 541.

A brother is one who has the same father and mother with another, or has only one of them, and so includes a brother of the half blood. State v. Guiton, 24 So. 784, 785, 51 La. Ann. 155.

Whenever the term is used without limitation, "brothers" of the half blood are included. Lynch v. Lynch, 64 Pac. 284, 285, 132 Cal. 214 (citing Gardner v. Collins [U. S.] 9 Fed. Cas. 1162; Id., 27 U. S. [2 Pet.] 58, 7 L. Ed. 347; Pearson v. Grice, 6 La. Ann. 232; Sheffield v. Lovering, 12 Mass. 490; Rowley v. Stray, 32 Mich. 70; Clark v. Sprague [Ind.] 5 Blackf. 412; Clay v. Cousins, 17 Ky. [1 T. B. Mon.] 75; Marlow v. King, 17 Tex. 177).

It cannot be legally assumed that the term "brother" necessarily and at all times and under all circumstances comprehends a half-brother, and the question with reference to its inclusion or exclusion of the half-brother is properly left to the jury in each particular case. Spitz v. Mutual Ben. Life Ass'n, 25 N. Y. Supp. 469, 473, 5 Misc. Rep. 245.

Under a statute providing that, in case a decedent shall leave no wife or descendants, father or mother, then his estate shall be equally divided among his brothers and sisters or their descendants, the term "brothers and sisters" includes those of the half blood. A brother of the half blood is a brother, as well as a brother of the whole blood. Anderson v. Bell, 140 Ind. 375, 379, 39 N. E. 735, 736, 29 L. R. A. 541.

Act 1835 (Swan's St. p. 286, § 1), declaring that if any person shall die intestate, etc., and there shall be no children or other legal representatives, the estate shall pass to the brothers and sisters of the intestate, includes not only brothers and sisters of the intestate, but half brothers and sisters of the ancestor, which also are to be preferred to the brothers and sisters of the intestate of the half blood, not of the blood of the ancestor from whom the estate came. Cliver v. Sanders, 8 Ohio St. 501, 504.

The term "brothers and sisters" as used in laws providing that, on the death of a decedent without children or father, his estate should descend to his mother, brothers, and sisters, includes brothers and sisters of the half blood. Doe v. Abernathy (Ind.) 7 Blackf. 442, 449.

Act 1797 provides that in all cases in which persons shall die intestate leaving neither wife nor children, but leaving a father or mother and brothers and sisters, the estate shall be equally divided among the father, or, if he be dead, the mother, and such brothers and sisters as may be living at the time of the death of such intestate, means brothers of the whole blood, and not brothers of the half blood. "Brother" is defined by Johnson as one born of the same father and mother. Lawson v. Perdriault (S. C.) 1 McCord, 456, 457.

The term "brother," as used in the statute punishing intercourse between brother and sister as incest, includes a brother of the half blood, as well as a brother of the full blood. State v. Wyman, 8 Atl. 900, 59 Vt. 527, 59 Am. Rep. 753.

Illegitimate.

A will describing a beneficiary to whom property was left as "my brother T." meant the person commonly called by that name and known as the brother of the testator, though he was not the testator's brother, but was the illegitimate child of the testator's mother before her marriage with his father. Dune v. Walker, 109 Mass. 179, 180.

In Rev. Code, §§ 4367, 4368, declaring that the marriage of a brother and his sister shall be punishable as incest, the terms "brother" and "sister" mean offspring of the same parent, whether legitimate or not, and therefore the fact that the marriage was consummated between a brother and sister, both or one of whom was illegitimate, was no defense to a prosecution under the statute. State v. Schaunhurst, 34 Iowa, 541, 549.

Stepbrother.

1 Rev. St. p. 752, § 6, provides that the inheritance shall descend to the mother in fee, in case the intestate leaves no descendant, father, brother, or sister, or descendant of a brother or sister. Section 15 provides that, in case an inheritance comes to an intestate by descent, devise, or gift of one of his ancestors, all those not the blood of such ancestor shall be excluded from such inheritance. Held, that the term "brother," as used in section 6, when construed in connection with section 15, did not include a stepbrother, but only a brother of the whole blood. Wheeler v. Clutterbuck, 52 N. Y. 67, 71.

BROTHER-IN-LAW.

The relationship between persons who have married sisters is not that of brother-in-law, which is defined by the Century and Webster's Dictionary as "the brother of one's husband or wife; also, one's sister's husband." Farmers' Loan & Trust Co. v. Iowa Water Co. (U. S.) 80 Fed. 467, 469.

BROUGHT.

The use of "brought," in Act 1857, which provides that all proceedings brought to obtain the forfeiture of any liquor license under the twelfth and thirteenth sections of the act for the suppression of intemperance, shall be held to be proceedings in rem, and not criminal proceedings, implies past time, and includes prosecutions then pending, as well as those thereafter to be brought. Hine v. Belden, 27 Conn. 384, 391.

In Rev. St. c. 32, §§ 29, 30, providing that an action may be maintained by one town against another to recover for the expenses incurred for the support of a pauper whose legal settlement is established in such town, and that a recovery in such action shall bar the town against which it shall be had from disputing the settlement of such pauper with the town thus recovering in any future action brought for the support of such pauper, the term "future action" is not necessarily confined to an action commenced after the action was commenced in which the judgment was rendered; but where two actions are pending at the same time, and after the first one is tried, pending an application for a new trial, the other one is tried, and final judgment rendered therein in favor of the defendant on the retrial of the first action, such judgment is a bar to a recovery in the first action. The word "brought," as used in such statute, is not inappropriate to designate an action which had been commenced at any time before the trial, and it does not necessarily designate one commenced after the action on trial was commenced. Inhabitants of Bangor v. Inhabitants of Brunswick, 33 Me. 352, 355.

As used in Act Cong. March 3, 1887, c. 373, § 3, 24 Stat. 553, relative to the removal of cases from state to federal courts, and requiring a party entitled to remove a suit from a state court to the circuit court of the United States to file a petition in such suit in such state court at the time the defendant is required by the laws of the state or the rule of the state court in which such suit is brought to answer or plead to the declaration, etc., means the state court in which suit is pending at the time the petition for the removal is filed. American Finance Co. v. Bostwick, 23 N. E. 656, 659, 151 Mass. 19.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1243, provides that all proceedings in regard to eminent domain shall be brought in the superior court of the county in which the property is situated. Held, that the words "to be brought" mean something more than that the proceeding must be commenced in such superior court, since there is strong reason why such proceedings should be had in the county where the land sought to be condemned is situated. The compensation for the land sought to be taken is to be determined on testimony, and the witnesses most competent to speak on that subject are usually found in the county referred to; and hence such proceedings shall be conducted in such county in their entirety. California S. R. Co. v. Southern Pac. R. Co., 4 Pac. 344, 345, 65 Cal. 394.

BROWN GREASE.

"Brown grease," as used in Customs Act 1897, par. 279, is equivalent to what is known commercially as "wool grease." Wool fat is the natural grease contained in sheep's wool. In the course of preparing the raw wool for spinning, this grease is removed by means of dilute soap solutions or by extraction with volatile solvents. The suds from wool scouring are collected in large tanks, and, by acidulating with mineral acids, brown grease is obtained. United States v. Leonard (U. S.) 108 Fed. 42, 43, 47 C. C. A. 181.

BRUISE.

"Bruised" is more definite than "hurt," but does not indicate necessarily or generally more than a temporary contusion, which may be on any part of the person, and light or severe, but seldom more than temporary in effect. Shaddock v. Alpine Plank Road Co., 44 N. W. 158, 159, 79 Mich. 7.

A bruise is a hurt with something blunt and heavy, and in judicial decisions it is synonymous with the word "wound." State v. Owen, 5 N. C. 452, 455, 4 Am. Dec. 571.

BUCKET SHOP.

As a game, see "Game."

"A bucket shop is a place where wagers are made on the fluctuations of the market prices of grain and other commodities." Bryant v. Western Union Tel. Co. (U. S.) 17 Fed. 825, 828; Fortenbury v. State, 1 S. W. 58, 59, 47 Ark. 188.

A bucket shop is a place where wheat, corn, pork, other provisions, and grain are bought and sold on margins. Lancaster v. McKinley (Ind.) 67 N. E. 947, 948.

The term "bucket shop," in Rev. St. 1889, § 3834, prohibiting the keeping of bucket shops, was defined in section 3835 to be a place, other than a duly incorporated merchants' exchange, wherein are published, from information received as the same occur, the fluctuating prices of stocks, bonds, petroleum, cotton, or grains, in trades made or offered to be made on regular and lawful boards of exchange, and wherein the person carrying on the bucket shop, either as principal or agent, pretends to buy or sell, or goes through the form of buying and selling, then and there, to any person or persons any one of said commodities at a certain price fixed by or according to the aforesaid prices posted or published, but wherein neither party actually buys or sells the same. Connor v. Black, 24 S. W. 184, 187, 119 Mo. 126.

A bucket shop is a place where grain, provisions, etc., are posted on blackboards as they come in on the ticker. The shop buys or sells indifferently, and always at the price appearing for the time being on the blackboard. The shop does not notify the customer of the fluctuations of the market, but he looks out for that on the blackboard. It is understood between the customer and the shop that there is no actual deal in grain, that there is none to be delivered, and that the difference in future prices is simply dealt in. In other words, the customer bets the shop that on a certain day in the future, or in a certain month in the future, wheat will be worth so much, and if in the time agreed the wheat is worth that much the customer wins, less the commission; if it is not worth that much, the shop wins. Smith

v. Western Union Tel. Co., 2 S. W. 483, 484, 84 Ky. 664.

Pool selling does not constitute a lottery or a policy or bucket shop, within the meaning of a municipal ordinance prohibiting the keeping of such establishments. People v. Reilly, 50 Mich. 384, 15 N. W. 520, 45 Am. Rep. 47.

A bucket shop is a place wherein are posted or published, from information received as the same occur, the fluctuating prices of stocks, bonds, petroleum, cotton, grain, provisions, or other commodities, or of any one or more of the same, in trades made or offered to be made on boards of exchange, or by any person, firm, or organization, and wherein the person carrying on the bucket shop, either as principal or agent, pretends to buy or sell, or goes through the form of buying and selling, then and there, to any other person or persons, any one of said commodities at a certain price fixed by or according to the aforesaid price posted or published, but wherein neither party actually buys such commodities, and neither party actually sells the same. Rev. St. Mo. 1899, § 2222.

The term "bucket shop" shall apply to all and every of the places mentioned in an act for the suppression of bucket shops, etc., and shall include, not only the place of the making, or permission to make, or offer to make wagering contracts, but also the place wherein is carried on the system of purchasing or selling of stocks, bonds, or securities, whether the contract is to be performed within or without this state, when the payment therefor is by certified check, or any other device given or made by or for the purchaser to the seller, and the delivery is by and for the seller to the purchaser, and such seller, or party acting for him, does not in good faith receive the cash upon such certified check or method of payment as is done in the regular course of legitimate business, or any such purchaser or party acting for him does not in like manner receive such stock, bonds, or other securities. Bates' Ann. St. Ohio 1904, § 6934a-4

BUCKWHEAT LAND.

A term used in Michigan to describe poor land or land in a deserted section of the country, which is in a wild and uncultivated state, and on which buckwheat is usually grown as the first crop. Stubly v. Beachboard, 36 N. W. 192, 196, 68 Mich. 401.

BUFFALO.

As defined by Webster, the buffalo is a species of wild ox, a species of the genus "bos" or "bubalus," originally from India, but now found in most of the warmer countries of the Eastern continent. While, perhaps, a buffalo is from the same genus as domestic cows and cattle, they are not the same kind of an animal, and hence could not be included within the meaning of the word "cattle," as it is used in Rev. St. 1845, p. 364, declaring that any person who shall maliciously kill or wound any cattle of another shall be punished, etc. State v. Crenshaw, 22 Mo. 457, 458.

BUFFERS.

The term "buffers" is used to designate timbers placed across the ends of cars, beyond which the drawheads slightly project. In coupling cars, the drawheads yield to the impact of the two cars, and the buffers of the cars coming together arrest the force of the blow. Cars constructed with buffers are considered to make the act of coupling cars more dangerous. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Boland, 11 South. 667, 96 Ala. 626, 18 L. R. A. 260.

BUGGERY.

"Buggery" is synonymous with "crime against nature." It includes both sodomy and bestiality, and is any unnatural connection between one man and another man, or between a person and a beast of the opposite sex. Ausman v. Beal, 10 Ind. 355, 356.

Act June 11, 1879, § 1 (P. L. 148), declares that "the terms 'sodomy' and 'buggery,' as and where used in the laws of this commonwealth, shall be understood to be a carnal copulation by human beings with each other against nature res veneria in ano or with a beast." Commonwealth v. J—, 21 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 625, 626.

BUGGY.

As carriage, see "Carriage."

As tool, see "Tools—Tools of Trade."

As wagon, see "Wagon."

BUILD.

See "Hereafter Built."

See, also, "Construct—Construction"; "Erect—Erection."

The word "build" is derived from the word "bold," meaning a dwelling. Rouse v. Catskill & N. Y. Steamboat Co., 13 N. Y. Supp. 126, 127, 35 N. Y. St. Rep. 491 (citing Truesdell v. Gray, 79 Mass. [13 Gray] 311).

In a certificate of the Governor of a state that he had made a careful examination of a military road since its completion, and that the same was built in all respects as required by recited acts of Congress, the word "built" was equivalent to the word "constructed," as used in such acts, and was, therefore, a sufficient compliance with the act requiring a certificate from the Governor that the road had been fully constructed. United States v. The Dalles Military Road Co. (U. S.) 51 Fed. 629, 636, 2 C. C. A. 419.

A franchise to build and maintain a flouring mill "imports the right to build a dam to obtain power to run the mill." Glinrich v. Patrons' Mill Co., 21 Kan. 61, 64.

Form and plans included.

A grant to a city council of general power to build a market implies a determination upon the form, dimensions, and fashion of the edifice, and the city council may employ a person of professional skill to furnish plans, drawings, specifications, and estimates. Peterson v. City of New York, 17 N. Y. 449, 453.

As acquire or obtain.

As used in the title of an act relating to the organization of associations for the purpose of raising funds to be loaned among their members for building homesteads and other purposes (Gen. St. 1873, c. 11), the word "build" will be held to have been employed in the sense of obtain, secure, or acquire, as well as the ordinary meaning of build, so that provisions of the act authorizing the purchase of lots or houses are not void, as not being included in the title. Nebraska Loan & Building Ass'n v. Perkins, 85 N. W. 67, 69, 61 Neb. 254.

As furnish machinery.

Whatever is supplied to a vessel for the purpose of making it what it was intended to be and to enable it to enter upon the kind of business or navigation intended is a part of the building of the vessel, thus including machinery. The Paradox (U. S.) 61 Fed. 860, 861.

As location of railroad.

In a subscription to the capital stock of a railroad company, provided the road is built inside of a certain distance north of a certain township, the word "built" means the permanent location of the road in the place designated, though the road was never completed. What the parties must have meant to provide for was the place of the road, and not its condition of completeness or incompleteness. Strictly speaking, to build a road is to complete it. When a subscription book speaks of a road to be built in one place in preference to another, it must be supposed and held that it was the location of the road, and not its structure, that was intended to be specified, which means less than a finished road. Warner v. Callender, 20 Ohio St. 190, 197.

As maintain.

To build or construct a railroad is one thing; to maintain the structure after it is erected or built is another; and neither authorizes the relocation of the road after completion on the first location, within a statute authorizing the construction and maintenance of a railroad. The word "maintenance" has reference to the powers to be exercised after completion. Moorhead v. Little Miami R. Co., 17 Ohio, 340, 353.

A statute authorizing certain persons to make a canal and take toll thereon, on the condition, among others, that they would "build suitable and convenient bridges" where the canal should cross the highways, meant not only that such persons should construct the bridges, but that they should maintain them in repair. Franklin County Com'rs v. White Water Valley Canal Co., 2 Ind. 162, 163.

A grant to a railroad company in its charter of the power of "laying, building, and making" a road includes the power of maintaining and sustaining it, which has reference to keeping it in repair, supplying it with machinery, and such like acts, but does not extend to projects for extending its business by schemes and enterprises not contemplated and expressed in clear, unambiguous terms. Central R. Co. v. Collins, 40 Ga. 582, 624.

As pave street.

In Rev. St. § 1592, empowering the board of aldermen in cities of the fourth class to tax abutting property for grading, macadamizing, building, guttering, and repairing streets, the word "building" includes paving. When defining the word "build," the International Dictionary does so thus: "To erect or construct, as a fabric or edifice of any kind; to form by uniting materials into a regular structure; to fabricate; to make; to raise." When used with reference to streets, the word "build" may well be regarded as a synonym of the word "make," or of the word "pave." Morse v. City of West Port, 19 S. W. 831, 832, 110 Mo. 502.

As repair.

"Build," as used in Pub. St. c. 34, § 5, providing that towns may appropriate money for building bridges, means to construct anew, and repairing is not building within the statute. State v. White, 18 Atl. 179, 16 R. I. 591.

"Built," as used in Olympia City Charter, § 3, subd. 25, requiring, as a preliminary to the building of the sidewalks and assessing and levying taxes therefor, that a petition by the majority of the property owners or a vote of two-thirds of the common council in favor be had, means "constructed" or "erected," and is therefore not synonymous with "repairs" or "repaired," and hence the city was not relieved from its obligation to repair by failure to procure a vote under the charter. Hutchinson v. City of Olympia, 5 Pac. 606, 608, 2 Wash. T. 314.

BUILT UPON.

St. 55 Geo. III, c. 25, § 3, authorizing commissioners "to view and inspect any street square, or other public passage or place within the limits," etc., "which now is or hereafter may be built upon or in building," does not apply to bridges built by a canal company, the roadways over which were used as public highways, and formed the sole connection at the particular spot between the streets on either side of the bridges, and which bridges were built of brick and had brick parapet walls from four to five feet high on the outer side of each footway. Arnell v. Regents Canal Co., 14 C. B. 564, 578.

BUILDER.

The terms "artisans, builders, and mechanics," in Gould's Dig. c. 112, § 1, giving a mechanic's lien to all artisans, builders, and mechanics of every description who shall perform any work and labor on any building, edifice, or tenement, does not include one selling lumber to be used in the construction of a dwelling house. Duncan v. Bateman, 23 Ark. 327, 79 Am. Dec. 109.

Architects and builders are well known as persons engaged, as a business, in planning, constructing, remodeling, and adapting to particular uses buildings and other structures. Turner v. Haar, 21 S. W. 737, 738, 114 Mo. 335.

A builder is one who builds, one whose occupation it is to build, an architect, a shipwright, a mason, etc. Savannah & C. R. Co. v. Callahan, 49 Ga. 506, 511.

Of vessel.

See "Ship Carpenter or Builder."

Act N. Y. April 24, 1862, c. 482, giving the builder of a vessel a lien thereon, is limited to and means the person having charge of the actual construction of the whole vessel, and hence cannot include a person hired by a subcontractor to do a part of the work he had contracted to do thereon. Calkin v. United States, 3 Ct. Cl. 297, 306.

One engaged in repairing and putting new machinery into a steam canal boat is a builder, within the meaning of Laws 1862, c. 482, providing for the collection of demands against ships and vessels for materials furnished to the builder of the same. King v. Greenway, 71 N. Y. 413.

BUILDING.

See "Building (In Criminal Law)"; "Building (In Insurance)"; "Building (In Lien Laws)"; "Building (In Revenue Laws)."

See "Boat Building"; "Brick Building"; "Farm Building"; "Frame Building"; "Inhabited Building"; "New Building"; "Outbuilding"; "Public Building"; "Wooden Building."

All buildings, see "All."

Other buildings, see "Other."

As included in term land, see "Land."

As personal property, see "Personal Property."

As tool, see "Tools—Tools of Trade."

A building is defined to be a structure in the nature of a house built where it is to stand; as commonly understood, a house for business, residence, or public use, or for shelter of animals or storage of goods, and very generally, though not always, the idea of a habitation for the permanent use of man, or an erection connected with his permanent use, is implied in the word "building." A building is a part of the land. One would not call a tent a building. In its broadest sense it can mean only an erection intended for the use or occupation as a habitation or for some purpose of trade, manufacture, ornament, or use, constituting an edifice, such as a house, a store, a church, or a shed. Rouse v. Catskill & N. Y. Steamboat Co., 18 N. Y. Supp. 126, 127, 35 N. Y. St. Rep. 491 (citing Truesdell v. Gray, 79 Mass. [13 Gray] 311).

Buildings, structures, and improvements, within the meaning of Code Civ. Proc. § 2134, providing that the interest in the land, building, structure, or other improvement in a leasehold interest shall be subject to lien, although the lease is forfeited, is to be construed to mean such buildings, structures, and improvements put upon the premises by the lessee as can be removed. Stenberg v. Liennemann, 52 Pac. 84, 85, 20 Mont. 457, 63 Am. St. Rep. 636.

Where a lease provided that if the lessee should tear down and remove the buildings not standing on the premises, and erect in place thereof a good and substantial building, such building should be valued and paid for at the termination of the lease, where the main building on the premises was not torn down or removed, but the front of the first story and basement was taken out, and iron columns and doors inserted, and stairs and partitions were torn down, and the floors lowered and relaid, and the rear wall of each of the stores was removed, and a flat roof put on, and two stories were made out of the attic story, there was no building erected, within the terms of the lease, for the price of which the landlord would be liable. Smith v. Cooley (N. Y.) 5 Daly. 401, 402.

Apartment, room, or tenement.

Rooms in a factory were let to separate tenants, the rents differing according to the size of the room, and the entry to which was either by common staircase leading from the entrance to the factory, or by separate outside staircase, or by doors opening into the yard. Each tenant had his own spinning machine, which was worked by a steam engine belonging to the landlord; it being a part of each contract that the landlord should supply steam power and also the exclusive use of his room and the key to the door thereof. Held, that the occupier of each room was the exclusive occupier of a "building," within St. 2 Wm. IV, c. 45, § 27, conferring the right of voting in the cities and boroughs upon the occupier of any house, warehouse, counting house, shop, or "other building." Pownall v. Dawson, 11 C. B. 9.

"Building," as used in St. 2 Wm. IV, c. 45, § 27, includes apartments in a house which were rented; the tenant having a key of the outer door and free and uncontrolled access thereto at all times, though the landlord occupied a portion of the premises, but did not reside therein. Toms v. Luckett, 5 Man., Gr. & S. 24, 35.

The word "building," as used in a town by-law requiring the tenant of a building to remove the snow from in front of the premises, is broad enough to include a "tenement." Town of Easthampton v. Hill, 38 N. E. 502, 162 Mass. 302.

Completion indicated.

In a contract by which plaintiff agreed to win stones for the purpose of building certain cottages, the term "building" could not be taken to include the completion of a building by plastering and tile pointing, and parol evidence could not be given to explain the sense in which the word was used. Charlton v. Gibson, 1 C. & K. 541, 542.

Fence.

When used in a covenant not to erect a building within a certain distance from a boundary line, may be held to include a fence, on a showing that the purpose and object of the covenant was to prevent the shutting off of light and air, and that a fence would have the same effect in this respect as a structure technically known as a "building." Wright v. Evans, 2 Abb. Prac. (N. S.) 308.

As used in a grant giving the grantee the right of cutting and hewing timber for building, includes the right to cut timber for making fences, and in common parlance the word "building" would have been understood as including the making of fences. Livingston v. Ten Broeck, 16 Johns. 14, 22, 8 Am. Dec. 287.

Flume.

See "Flume."

Hustings.

Hustings erected to take the poll at a contested election for members to serve in Parliament are not a building, within St. 57 Geo. III, c. 19, § 38, so that no action lies against the hundred for the destruction of such property by a tumultuous assembly. Allen v. Ayre, 3 Dow. & R. 96.

Jail cell.

1 Gen. St. 1889, par. 1633, providing that boards of county commissioners (who have power to purchase sites for, build, and keep in repair county buildings, levy taxes therefor, and care for the county property) shall not build any permanent county buildings without submitting the question to a vote of the electors of the county, does not include one or two cells in a jail building. A cell is but a very small room, and it can hardly be contended that the manufacture and erection of a room in a building, whether small or large, would be forbidden by an inhibition to construct a permanent building. Pauly Jail-Bldg. & Mfg. Co. v. Kearney County Com'rs (U. S.) 68 Fed. 171, 173, 15 C. C. A. 351.

Land occupied included.

"A lease of the wooden building south of the brick dwelling house" of the lessor does not pass as parcel of the wooden building or appurtenant thereto any title in an outbuilding, yard, and passageway within a curtilage or inclosure adjoining the wooden building, but not distinct from the brick house; but any right of way or other easement necessary to the enjoyment of the demised premises passes as appurtenant thereto, although not expressly mentioned in the lease. Oliver v. Dickinson, 100 Mass. 114, 117.

The land upon which the walls of a stone or brick building rest, or, indeed, of any other kind of a building, which in law is considered as annexed to the soil, and which is not clearly severed therefrom by the terms of the deed itself, must be considered as part of the building, and a sale of the building, therefore, would carry the title to the land upon which it stands. Wade v. Odle, 54 S. W. 786, 788, 21 Tex. Civ. App. 656.

A lease of a building, where the landlord owns the real estate under the eaves thereof, embraces such land. Sherman v. Williams, 113 Mass. 481, 484, 18 Am. Rep. 522.

As main building.

Where a subscription for the building of a church was according to its terms to be paid "when the building is inclosed," such phrase meant when the main building was inclosed; and hence, when such part of the building was inclosed, the subscription was payable, notwithstanding that some towers on the building had not been inclosed. Snell v. Methodist Episcopal Church, 58 Ill. 290, 293.

Mill flume.

In 1 Rev. St. p. 514, § 57, providing that no public road shall be laid through any buildings, or any fixtures or erections for the purpose of trade or manufacture, without the consent of the owner, buildings cannot be construed to include the channel by which water is conducted from a creek to a saw-mill, within any natural or fair meaning of the term. People v. Kingman, 24 N. Y. 559, 562.

Monument.

A monument is not a building, within the meaning of the condition of a deed to a city conveying a square, and providing that no part of it shall be made use of for erecting any sort of a building thereon. A monument may take the shape of a memorial hall or other building, but that is not the general sense of the word, and will not be presumed. A statue upon a pedestal, even though the latter be large, is not a building within the proper meaning of the term. Appeal of State Soc. of Cincinnati, 28 Atl. 647, 651, 154 Pa. 621, 20 L. R. A. 323.

The term "building" does not include a monument 100 feet in height on a platform 120 feet long and erected in a city park. Parsons v. Van Wyck, 67 N. Y. Supp. 1054, 1058, 56 App. Div. 329.

Act April 19, 1895 (P. L. 38), requiring county commissioners, in the erection of a courthouse, jail, or other "building," to let the work to the lowest bidder, cannot be construed to include a monument to be erected in memory of soldiers and sailors. A monument may take the shape of a memorial hall or other building, but that is not the general use of the word and will not be presumed. A statue on a pedestal, even though the latter be large, is not a building, within the proper meaning of the term. Van Baman v. Gallagher, 37 Atl. 832, 834, 182 Pa. 277.

Porch or steps.

As used in a deed, providing that "all buildings" upon the lots conveyed should be erected not less than 15 feet back from the fence line, means all substantial parts of all buildings. While merely incidental encroachments on this space by steps or eaves or ornamental projections might not amount to violations of the agreement, a porch extending the whole width of the house, as a substantial and integral part of it, is clearly so. Ogontz Land & Improve- ment Co. v. Johnson, 31 Atl. 1008, 1009, 168 Pa. 178.

Approaches and steps are not a part of a building, so that a contract to furnish "all the dimension stone that may be required" in the "construction of a building" does not include stone used in the approaches or steps leading up to the building. United States v. Mueller, 5 Sup. Ct. 380, 382, 113 U. S. 153, 28 L. Ed. 946.

Stable, shed, or other outbuilding.

A stable, with a hay loft over, built of brick, annexed to which, but of a lower elevation, was another brick building, to which again was annexed an irregular wooden building divided into three compartments, the whole of which was in the exclusive occupation of one person, and used by him for the purpose of his business of a wheelwright, there being no internal communication, constitutes a building, within St. Wm. IV, c. 45, § 27. Pownall v. Dawson, 11 C. B. 9.

As used in St. 2 Wm. IV, c. 45, § 27, "building" includes a cow barn or stable. Whitmore v. Bedford, 5 Man. & G. 9, 16.

"Building," as used in St. 2 Wm. IV, c. 45, § 27, should be construed to include a shed closed on two sides, having a roof, and used for the purposes connected with the occupation of a wharf and also used by another as a place of deposit for goods. It is a thing ejusdem generis with those particularly enumerated. Watson v. Cotton, 57 Eng. C. L. 50, 53.

A cow stable, wagon shed, and chicken house are buildings, within the statute providing that no public highway shall be laid out through any building or fixture without the consent of the owner. Smart v. Hart, 75 Wis. 471, 44 N. W. 514.

Steamboat.

"The word 'building' is derived from the Anglo Saxon 'bold,' meaning a dwelling. Building is defined to be a structure in the nature of a house, built where it is to stand. As commonly understood, it means a house for residence, business, or public use, or for the shelter of animals or storage of goods, and very generally, though not always, the idea of a habitation for the permanent use of man, or an erection connected with its permanent use, is implied by the word. It is defined by Bouvier as 'an edifice erected by art and fixed on the soil, composed of different pieces of stone, brick, marble, wood, or other substance, designed for permanent use in the position in which it is so fixed.' A building is a part of the land. In its broadest sense it can only mean an erection intended for use and occupation as a habitation, or for some purpose of trade, manufacture, ornament, or use, constituting a fabric or edifice, such as a house, a store, a church, a shed. A tent is not a building, neither is a vault for the interment of the dead, although above ground; and a steamboat is not a building, within the meaning of Laws N. Y. 1873, c. 646, making any person owning, renting, or permitting the occupation of any building, wherein intoxicating liquors are sold, liable for damages" etc. Rouse v. Catskill & N. Y. Steamboat Co., 13 N. Y. Supp. 126, 127, 59 Hun, 80.

Structure resting on timbers or posts.

In St. 18 & 19 Vict. c. 122, art. 1, providing that every building shall be inclosed with walls constructed with brick, stone, or other hard and incombustible substance, and the foundations shall rest on solid ground or upon other solid substructure, the word "building" should be construed to include a structure of wood of considerable size (16 by 13 feet), and intended to be permanently used as a shop, though not laid into the ground, but merely laid upon timbers upon the surface. Stevens v. Gourley, 97 Eng. C. L. 99, 109.

"Building," as used in a deed of land providing that the grantees should not erect on the land any house or other "building" nearer the line of a certain street than a certain number of feet, should be construed to include a structure raised on posts, with a roof supported by pillars. Evans v. Mary A. Riddle Co. (N. J.) 43 Atl. 894, 895.

Tent.

A tent about 10 by 12 feet in size used by a lot owner to live in with his family, but not to sleep in, it being fitted up with a cook stove and other furniture, and occupied temporarily, is a building, within a deed of the lot prohibiting the erection thereon of any buildings other than dwellings, such dwellings to cost not less than a certain sum; the tent being of less value than that sum. The ordinary meaning of the word "building" is said by Mr. Justice Morton, in Nowell v. Boston Academy of Notre Dame, 130 Mass. 209, to be a structure or edifice inclosing a place within its walls and usually covered with a roof. Blakemore v. Stanley (Mass.) 33 N. E. 689, 690.

Two distinct buildings.

"Building," as used in St. 2 Wm. IV, c. 45, § 27, cannot apply to two distinct buildings, in order to make the occupant a voter. Dewhurst v. Feilden, 7 Man. & G. 182, 186.

Wall.

A deed conveyed certain premises, subject to the restriction that no building erected on the land should be less than two stories in height, exclusive of the basement and attic, etc. Held, that "building" should be construed to mean a structure or edifice inclosing a space within its walls and usually covered with a roof, such as a house, a church, a shop, a barn, or a shed, and does not include a wall six feet in height, to be used as a fence or wall. Nowell v. Boston Academy of Notre Dame, 130 Mass. 209, 210.

Local Paving Act 55 Geo. III, c. 25, § 3, requiring commissioners to inspect "any street, square, or other public passage or place which now is or hereafter may be built upon or in building," does not apply to a bridge which forms part of a public highway, other streets communicating with each end of the bridge, and which was built of brick over a canal and had brick walls from four to five feet high on either side; the walls not constituting a building. Arnell v. Regent's Canal Co., 25 Eng. Law & Eq. 351, 354.

Wholly or partially destroyed building.

A building is defined as an edifice for any use, as a house for residence, business, or public use, so that, where a building has been destroyed by fire, except the four walls, no "building" exists, within the meaning of a lease. Corbett v. Spring Garden Ins. Co., 58 N. Y. Supp. 148, 153, 40 App. Div. 628.

BUILDING (In Criminal Law).

Any house, edifice, structure, vessel, or other erection, capable of affording shelter for human beings or appurtenant to or connected with an erection so adapted, is a building, within the meaning of the chapter in the Penal Code defining and punishing arson. Rev. St. Utah, 1898, § 4327; Pen. Code N. Y. 1903, § 493; Pen. Code Idaho, 1901, § 4923; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 7383; Pen. Code S. D. 1903, § 543; Pen. Code Cal. 1903, § 448.

The term "building," as used in the Penal Code, includes a railway car, vessel, booth, tent, shop, or other erection or inclosure. Gen. St. Minn. 1894, § 6685. The term "building," as used in the chapter of the Penal Code defining and punishing burglary, includes a railway car, vessel, booth, tent, shop, or other erection or inclosure. Pen. Code N. Y. 1903, § 504.

"Building," as used in that part of the Penal Code defining and punishing arson, includes any bridge, edifice, vessel, structure, house, or other erection, with walls or roof, in whole or in part. Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 2411.

A statute declaring that every person who shall willfully and maliciously set fire to certain designated classes of buildings, or to any "building" or room occupied as a shop or office for professional business, shall be deemed guilty of arson, means a building used for one of the purposes designated by the words which follow it. An indictment merely charging the burning of a building is insufficient, as it should allege the purpose for which the building was occupied. State v. O'Connell, 26 Ind. 206, 267.

The term "building," in a statute defining burglary as the unlawful entry of any office, shop, store, etc., or any other building in which goods, merchandise, or valuable goods are kept for use, safety, or deposit, with intent to commit a felony, is qualified by the clause relevant to the keeping of valuable goods in such building, and therefore, in a prosecution for breaking into any building other than enumerated buildings, it must be shown that valuable goods were kept therein; but it is not necessary to make the showing in a prosecution for breaking or entering any of the enumerated buildings. State v. Sufferin, 32 Pac. 1021, 6 Wash. 107.

In construing Pen. Code 1895, art. 843, defining the term "house," as used in the law of burglary, to be any "building" or structure erected for public or private use, the court say that the word "building" means a fabric built or constructed; a structure; an edifice as commonly understood; a house for a residence, business, or public use, or for shelter of animals or storage of goods. Favro v. State, 46 S. W. 832, 39 Tex. Cr. R. 452, 73 Am. St. Rep. 950.

The term "building," within the meaning of the statute making it criminal to burn any building whatsoever, includes a building owned by the person setting it on fire, but in the possession of another who has a qualified ownership therein. Erskine v. Commonwealth (Va.) 8 Grat. 624, 627.

Addition or improvements.

As the word "building" is used in a city ordinance forbidding the erection of wooden buildings on a certain street, or between that street and the sea, it includes an addition or change to a building already erected, which so changes the plan, structure, dimensions, and general appearance of the building already erected that, according to common understanding of men, it would be called a new building or a rebuilding. DeHone v. Long Branch Com'rs, 25 Atl. 274, 275, 55 N. J. Law (26 Vroom) 108.

Apartment, room, or tenement.

Pen. Code, art. 709, defining a house to be any building or structure erected for public or private use, of whatever material it may be constructed, should be construed to include an office, apartment, or room, in one corner of a hardware room, made of pickets about four feet high, one inch square, and three inches apart, on top of which there was a plank, in which the account books, money, etc., of a lumber company were kept, and where the business of such company was transacted by their agent or clerk; it being a place partitioned off and used separately from any other portion of a hardware house for a particular purpose. Webster defines a building to be "a fabric or edifice constructed; a thing built; as a house, church, etc." Mr. Bouvier defines a building to be "an edifice erected by art, and fixed upon or over the soil, composed of brick, stone, marble, wood, or other proper substance connected together and designed for use in the position it is so fixed." Anderson v. State, 17 Tex. App. 305, 310.

St. 1855, c. 405, prohibited the keeping of any building for the illegal sale or illegal keeping of intoxicating liquors. An indictment under such statute charged the keeping of a certain building. Held, that the word "building," as thus used, meant the entire structure wherein the liquors were alleged to have been kept, as distinguished from a tenement or various tenements in the building, and thus, where the proof showed that defendant did not occupy the whole building, but sold liquors in a single room therein, there was a fatal variance. Commonwealth v. McCaughey, 75 Mass. (9 Gray) 296, 297.

An indictment charged that defendant was the owner of a certain tenement and building, being the first tenement and building on a certain side of a street, and that he let the said tenement and building to a person who used the same for the illegal sale of intoxicating liquors. Held that the words "tenement" and "building" were used as synonymous with each other. Commonwealth v. Bossidy 112 Mass. 277, 278.

Cemetery vault.

A stone vault in a cemetery, used for the interment of dead bodies, although wholly above ground, is not a building, within Pen. Code, § 498, defining the crime of burglary in the third degree as the breaking into a building. People v. Richards, 15 N. E. 371, 372, 108 N. Y. 137, 2 Am. St. Rep. 373.

Chicken house.

The phrase "other building," as used in Gen. St. 1901, § 2059, providing that every person who shall be convicted of breaking and entering in the nighttime any shop, store, booth, tent, warehouse, or other building, shall be adjudged guilty of burglary in the second degree, includes a frame chicken house having doors and a board roof. State v. Poole, 70 Pac. 637, 638, 65 Kan. 713.

Corncrib.

A corncrib is a building, within the provisions of a statute punishing larceny from a building. State v. Gibson, 66 N. W. 742, 743, 97 Iowa, 416; Brown v. State, 52 Ala. 345, 347.

A crib in which corn and fodder are kept is undoubtedly such a structure as comes within the provisions of a statute punishing the burning of a house or building. Brown v. State, 52 Ala. 345, 347.

An indictment merely charging the breaking and entering of a corncrib, and not a building called a corncrib, is insufficient. "We have been unable to find this word 'corncrib' in Worcester's Dictionary, and it is not necessarily a building, ship, or vessel. 'Corn' is defined to be a cereal grain, and the word is correctly used in this country in place of Indian corn or maize. 'Crib' has various definitions, as the manger of a stable, a bin, a frame for a child's bed, a small habitation, and is used in the latter sense by Shakespeare. Nowhere else do we find it used in the sense of a building." Wood v. State, 18 Fla. 967, 969.

A building is a structure made for use or convenience, and designed for the habitation of men or animals, or the sheltering of property, and hence includes a corncrib, so that larceny from a corncrib is larceny from a building, within the meaning of Code, § 3894. State v. Gibson, 66 N. W. 742, 743, 97 Iowa, 416. CONTRA, see Wood v. State, 18 Fla. 967, 969.

Depot.

"Webster defines 'depot' to be a place of deposit for storing goods, a warehouse, a storehouse. Worcester defines it as a place where any kind of goods is deposited, a storehouse, a warehouse." A railroad depot is a building, within the meaning of Rev. St. § 3526, defining burglary in the second degree to be the breaking and entry of any depot, store, tent, warehouse, or other building, with intent to steal therein. State v. Edwards, 19 S. W. 91, 92, 109 Mo. 315.

Under a statute defining burglary to be the breaking and entering of any shop, store, booth, tent, warehouse, or other building, an indictment alleging that the defendant did break and enter the depot of a certain railway company was sustained, as the depot was either a warehouse or other building. Bigham v. State, 31 Tex. Cr. R. 244, 250, 20 S. W. 577 (citing State v. Edwards, 109 Mo 315, 19 S. W. 91).

As dwelling house.

Under Rev. St. 668, § 16, declaring that no building shall be deemed a dwelling house, within the meaning of the provision relating to burglary, unless the same be adjoined to, immediately connected with, and a part of, a dwelling house, "a structure must of itself be a building, so as to stand and subsist, separate and independent from the other structure, which is the dwelling house of the owner." Quinn v. People, 71 N. Y. 561, 570, 27 Am. Rep. 87.

A defendant cannot be convicted on an indictment charging him with burning a building, under a statute providing penalties therefor, when the building burned is a dwelling house, and such crime is covered by other sections of the statute. State v. Atkinson, 58 N. W. 1034, 1035, 88 Wis. 1.

Inclosed park.

Webster defines a building to be: "A fabric or edifice constructed for use or convenience, as a house, a church, a shop. This is the universal meaning of the word." And it is so used in Gen. St. tit. 52, § 4, prohibiting the keeping open on Sunday of a shop, house, store, saloon, or other building in which it is reputed that spirituous and intoxicating liquors, ale, and lager beer are exposed for sale; and hence the term does not include an inclosed park, in which such liquors are sold. State v. Barr, 39 Conn. 40, 44.

Engine room.

Cr. Code, § 36, provides that whoever shall enter any dwelling house, kitchen, office, shop, storehouse, etc., or other building, shall be guilty of burglary. Held, that the term "other building," as so used, meant an erection separate from other buildings, and hence an engine room, which was apart from a mill and attached to the mill, was not within the term as so used. Kincaid v. People, 28 N. E. 1060, 1061, 139 Ill. 213.

House synonymous.

"House" and "building" are synonymous terms, and hence an indictment for burning a "building" is not at variance with an information in extradition proceedings charging defendant with the burning of a two-story brick house. State v. Spiegel, 83 N. W. 722, 724, 111 Iowa, 701.

The words "building or house," in an indictment charging that defendant burned a "building or house," are evidently used as terms of synonymous import, and intended to designate one and the same building, and therefore there is no uncertainty as to the location, by using the conjunctive "or," which will invalidate the indictment. State v. Moore, 61 Mo. 276, 278.

The word "house" in its ordinary meaning is understood to mean a building, and therefore its use in an indictment charging defendant with burning a certain flour, grist, and corn mill house is sufficient to show the burning of the building. Jordan v. State, 41 N. E. 817, 818, 142 Ind. 422.

While the word "house" is used in a broader and more comprehensive sense than "dwelling house," it has a narrower and more restricted meaning than the word "building." State v. Garity, 46 N. H. 61, 62.

Incomplete structure.

"A 'building' is a fabric or edifice constructed for use," within the meaning of that word in 2 Rev. St. p. 667, § 4, making it a felony to burn any "building" erected for the manufacture of cotton or woolen goods, and does not include the frame of a factory, not completely constructed and ready for use. McGary v. People, 45 N. Y. 153, 161.

A structure is a building, within a statute punishing arson, while it is yet incomplete and unfinished, and the word does not necessarily import that the structure is so far advanced as to be in every respect perfect for the purpose for which it is designed eventually to be used. Commonwealth v. Squire, 42 Mass. (1 Metc.) 258, 259.

"Webster defines the word 'building' as a fabric or edifice constructed, a thing built. Worcester defines it a structure or edifice constructed for use or convenience, as a house, church, shop. In La Crosse & M. R. Co. v. Vanderpool, 11 Wis. 121, 78 Am. Dec. 691, Mr. Justice Paine says the well-understood meaning of the word is a structure which has a capacity to contain, and is designed for, the habitation of man or animals, or the sheltering of property." As used in Rev. St. § 4409, making it burglary to break and enter in the nighttime any office, shop, or other building not adjoining or occupied with any dwelling house, it will be construed to include a structure in the process of erection, which is so far completed that it may be temporarily or permanently used for the shelter of man or beast. Clark v. State, 33 N. W. 436, 438, 69 Wis. 203, 2 Am. St. Rep. 732.

A building is a fabric or edifice constructed for use. A building intended for a house not completed is not a house, within a statute authorizing the recovery of satisfaction for burning a house. "To erect," when used in connection with a house, or church, or factory, is "to build," and neither can be said to be erected until they are built, completed. McGary v. People (N. Y.) 1 Cow. Cr. R. 338, 343.

A structure in course of erection, intended for a dwelling, but unfit for the purpose for which it is ultimately designed, but so far complete as to be used temporarily or permanently for the shelter or occupation of man or beast, or the storage of tools or other personal property for safe-keeping, is a "building," within the meaning of section 4409, defining and punishing burglary. Clark v. State, 33 N. W. 436, 438, 69 Wis. 203, 2 Am. St. Rep. 732.

Planing mill.

A planing mill, as ordinarily used, is a building, and therefore an indictment charging the breaking and entering of a planing mill sufficiently charges the breaking and entering of a "building." State v. Haney, 81 N. W. 151, 110 Iowa, 26.

Saloon.

The words "other building," as used in Gen. St. p. 330, providing that every person who shall be convicted of breaking and entering in the nighttime any shop, store, booth, tent, warehouse or other building, etc., shall be adjudged guilty of burglary, includes a saloon building. State v. Comstock, 20 Kan. 650, 651.

Stable, shed, or other outbuilding.

"Building," as used in a statute defining burglary to be the breaking into a building, etc., includes a stable. Orrell v. People, 94 Ill. 456, 457, 34 Am. Rep. 241; Gillock v. People, 49 N. E. 712, 713, 171 Ill. 307.

Uninhabited building.

"Building," as used in Pen. Code, § 179, providing for the punishment of any one stealing property in a dwelling house, store, shop, warehouse, or any other "building," means an edifice for any use, that which is built as a dwelling house, barn, etc., and includes a stationary structure eight feet tall, covered with shingles and inclosed with wire, erected for the purpose of the safe-keeping of birds and fowls. Williams v. State (Ga.) 32 S. E. 129, 105 Ga. 814, 70 Am. St. Rep. 82 (quoting Standard Dict.).

The word building, in a statute declaring that the offense of burglary may be committed in any dwelling house or in any other house or "building," is to be construed to mean a building, without regard to its inhabitancy. State v. Dan, 4 Pac. 336, 18 Nev. 345.

A "building," as the term is used in the statute defining arson, includes any house, edifice, vessel, or other protection capable of affording shelter for human beings. It is not necessary that such building should have been intended for or have been used as a habitation, but it is sufficient if it be capable of affording shelter for human beings. People v. Fisher, 51 Cal. 319, 320.

Wholly or partially destroyed building.

When a building has been torn down, it ceases to be a "building or structure," within the meaning of Pen. Code, art. 652, defining a "house" which can be the subject of arson as any "building or structure," etc. It has lost the arrangement of its parts—its form, make, and construction. Mulligan v. State, 7 S. W. 664, 25 Tex. Cr. App. 190, 8 Am. St. Rep. 435.

BUILDING (In Insurance).

Where an insurance policy covers a brick building, and from defect of construction it falls and the materials take fire, they are not a building within the terms of the policy. Nave v. Home Mut. Ins. Co., 37 Mo. 430, 431, 90 Am. Dec. 394.

Brick den heater.

A "building," within the meaning of a fire policy thereon, includes a brick den heater. Adams v. Greenwich Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 9 Hun, 45, 49.

Cellar or foundation wall.

The word "building" necessarily embraces the foundation on which it rests; and the cellar, if there be one, under the edifice, is also included in the term "house" or "building." If there be a cellar, the word "building" includes it, unaffected by the height above the foundation. Benedict v. Ocean Ins. Co., 31 N. Y. 389, 394.

The word "building," as used in a fire policy insuring a building, includes the cellar wall. Ervin v. New York Cent. Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 3 Thomp. & C. 213, 215.

Scow.

Whether or not a building, within the meaning of a fire policy includes a scow, is a question of fact, and evidence is proper to show that similar scows were treated as buildings in the sense of the policy. Enos v. Sun Ins. Co., 8 Pac. 379, 67 Cal. 621.

Stable, shed, or outbuilding.

A hog pen and hen house, from 3½ to 6 feet high, covered with boards, with a partition of boards between them, are not "buildings," within the meaning of an application for insurance, which represents that there are no buildings not disclosed within a certain distance. White v. Mutual Fire Assur. Co., 74 Mass. (8 Gray) 566, 567.

Wholly or partially destroyed building.

A clause in a policy of insurance against fire that, if the building shall fall except by fire, the insurance shall immediately cease, refers to the falling of the whole building, and would not include a case where only a small part of the building had fallen, more than three-quarters of which remained standing. Breuner v. Liverpool & London & Globe Ins. Co., 51 Cal. 101, 107, 21 Am. Rep. 703.

Where the roof and interior woodwork of a building are destroyed by fire, leaving the walls standing, though somewhat damaged, it is a question for the jury as to whether such structure constituted a building. Corbett v. Spring Garden Ins. Co., 32 N. Y. Supp. 1059, 1062, 85 Hun, 250.

BUILDING (In Lien Laws).

The words "building or other improvement," as used in the chapter relating to liens, shall be held to include and apply to any wharf, bridge, ditch, flume, tunnel, fence, machinery, aqueduct to create hydraulic power, or for mining or other purposes, and all other structures and superstructures, whenever the same can be made applicable thereto. B. & C. Comp. Or. 1901, § 5652.

St. N. C. March 28, 1870, giving a lien to mechanics and laborers for labor performed on any "building, lot, farm, and any kind of property not herein enumerated," does not give a lien on the roadway, bridges, or other property of a railroad. Buncombe County Com'rs v. Tommey, 5 Sup. Ct. 626, 629, 115 U. S. 122, 29 L. Ed. 308.

The term "building," in the mechanic's lien statute, authorizing liens on buildings, includes a building used for a railroad depot; there being no rule of public policy which will preclude the enforcement of a lien against the railroad company on the ground that it is a public servant. Hill v. La Crosse & M. R. Co., 11 Wis. 214, 224.

An act authorizing a lien in favor of mechanics for work performed toward the erection, construction, or finishing of a building, does not authorize a lien for the flagging of sidewalks, yards, and areas of buildings in the process of erection. Knaube v. Kerchner, 39 Ind. 217, 218 (citing McDermott v. Palmer [N. Y.] 2 E. D. Smith, 675).

Addition or improvement.

Civ. Code, § 2802, provides that every person, firm, or corporation that gives out to contract "the building or construction of any house, store, mill, railroad, or other structure of like nature, shall retain 25 per cent. of the contract price thereof, until the contractor shall submit to such person, firm, or corporation an affidavit that all debts incurred in building or constructing such house, store, mill, railroad, or other structure of like nature, have been paid." Section 2802 makes any firm or corporation who shall pay over to a contractor said 25 per cent. without requiring the affidavit liable to that extent of the contract price to any materialman or laborer for material furnished or work for said contractor "in building or constructing said house, store, mill, railroad, or other structure of like nature." Held, that the word "building" has a double significance, and may be employed to express the idea of original construction, or it may serve the purpose of expressing the idea of reconstruction or the building of an annex to an edifice already constructed, which would form so considerable a part of the building originally added to as to constitute a new building, and in that event it would amount to a "building" within the meaning of the term. Willis v. Boyd, 29 S. E. 707, 103 Ga. 130.

Under the mechanic's lien law, giving a lien on every building erected, but not for adding to or altering old buildings, a building whose structure "is so completely changed that in common parlance it may be properly called a new building or rebuilding" will be included. Armstrong v. Ware, 20 Pa. (8 Harris) 519, 520.

In Code, § 3019, giving a lien for labor or materials furnished for any "building or improvement" on land, or for repairing the same, the terms "building" and "improvement" are not necessarily synonymous, and have a different signification from "repairs," though "repairs" may be an improvement. The term "building" refers to an independent erection on the land. An improvement may be an independent structure or addition, and it may be an addition to or mere betterment of a building or improvement already made. Wimberly v. Mayberry, 10 South. 157, 158, 94 Ala. 240, 14 L. R. A. 305.

Block of houses.

The word "building," as used in every mechanic's lien law, is strictly applicable to a block which, though composed of separate houses, is put up as a whole; but it cannot be predicated of separate blocks in different streets, which could in no aspect be viewed as entire. Chambers v. Yarnall, 15 Pa. (3 Harris) 265, 267.

As used in Hill's Ann. Laws, § 3669, giving a lien to every mechanic or other person performing labor or furnishing material to be used in the construction of any "building," though used in the singular, should be construed as including the plural number also, so that a person who, under an entire contract, has furnished material used indiscriminately in the erection of several houses on contiguous lots belonging to the same owner may include all the buildings and lots in one notice of lien, and need not file a separate notice for each building and lot. Willamette Steam Mills Lumbering & Mfg. Co. v. Shea, 32 Pac. 759, 24 Or. 40.

Bridge.

The words "build" and "building," as a verb and participle, are commonly used as applicable to the erection of numerous structures, which are not to be included among houses or other structures erected as habitation for either men or animals, or for sheltering property. Thus, we speak of building bridges, sidewalks, embankments, etc. But, as used in statutes, giving mechanics' liens on "buildings," the word refers to structures in the nature of houses only, and fences and bridges are not included. La Crosse & M. R. Co. v. Vanderpool, 11 Wis. 119, 121, 78 Am. Dec. 691.

The word "building" in laws giving laborers and materialmen a lien on any building on which they performed labor or to which they furnished materials, should be strictly construed to mean a house or similar structure, and hence does not embrace a bridge. Pike County Com'rs v. Norrington, 32 Ind. 190, 196; Burt v. Washington, 3 Cal. 246.

Cellar or foundation wall.

"Building," as used in a statute providing for a mechanic's lien upon a building and the land upon which it stands, includes the substructure as well as the superstructure; there being no distinction between substructure and superstructure in the meaning of the statute, but it is all superstructure. The foundation walls of the building, though lowered in the earth, are just as much a part of the building as its upper story or roof is, and even a more essential part. The foundation wall of a mill, which constitutes part of the milldam, is still a part of the building constituting the mill. Baker v. Waldron, 42 Atl. 225, 226 92 Me. 17, 69 Am. St. Rep. 483.

Church.

"Building" is defined by Webster to be an edifice erected for use or convenience, such as a house or church; and, as used in Act June 16, 1836, authorizing a mechanic's lien on any "building," etc., the term includes a church. Presbyterian Church v. Allison, 10 Pa. (10 Barr) 413, 416.

Hill's Ann. Laws § 3669, providing for mechanic's liens for material furnished in the construction of any building, will be held to include a church. Harrisburg Lumber Co. v. Washburn, 44 Pac. 390, 391, 29 Or. 150 (citing Phillips on Mechanic's Liens, [3d Ed.] § 171; Presbyterian Church v. Allison, 10 Pa. [10 Barr] 413).

Coke oven.

A coke oven, which is an erection of stone about six feet high, arched over at the top, with a hole in the crown for the exit of gases and introduction of coal, and a door in front for the discharge of coke, is not a building, within Act Pa. June 16, 1836, § 1, and amendatory acts, providing that every building shall be subject to a lien for all debts contracted for work done or materials furnished for or about the erection or construction of the same. In Truesdell v. Gay, 79 Mass. (13 Gray) 311, the court says: "Taken in its broadest sense, the word 'building' can mean only an erection intended for use and occupation as a habitation, or for some purpose of trade, manufacture, ornament, or use, constituting a fabric or edifice, such as a house, a store, a church, a shed." A coke oven is not intended as a habitation or for shelter; neither is it capable of occupation and use for the purpose of trade, etc., in the sense of the above definition. It is no more a building than is any other oven erected on land, for the purpose of baking bread or drying any substance. Central Trust Co. v. Cameron Iron & Coal Co. (U. S.) 47 Fed. 136.

Curbing, grading, or paving.

A statute giving a lien for labor and materials furnished for the building, altering, repairing, or ornamenting of any house or other building, or appurtenance thereto, does not give a lien on a lot for curbing, grading, and paving the street in front of the same. Smith v. Kennedy, 89 Ill. 485, 486.

Ditch.

As used in Act 1855, giving a mechanic's lien on "buildings, wharves, and other superstructures," the quoted phrase cannot be construed to include a ditch used in connection with waterworks. Ellison v. Jackson Water Co., 12 Cal. 542, 553; Horn v. Jones, 28 Cal. 194, 203.

Fence.

St. 1851, c. 343, § 1, authorizing a lien for labor performed in erecting, altering, or repairing any "building," does not include every species of erection on land, such as fences, gates, and other like structures, but applies only to an erection intended for use and occupation as a habitation for some purpose of trade, manufacture, ornament, or use, constituting a fabric or edifice, such as a house, a store, a church, or a shed. Truesdell v. Gay, 79 Mass. (13 Gray) 311, 312.

A fence is not a building, within the mechanic's lien law. Bailey v. Hull, 11 Wis. 289, 290, 78 Am. Dec. 706.

Floating dock or wharf.

A floating dock is not a "building or a fixture," within the meaning of those words as used in a mechanic's lien law. Coddington v. Hudson County Dry Dock & Wet Dock Co., 31 N. J. Law (2 Vroom) 477, 487.

Floating wharves, for receiving, storing, and forwarding merchandise, are "buildings," within the mechanic's lien law. Olmsted v. McNall (Ind.) 7 Blackf. 387, 389.

Incomplete building.

Rev. St. 1888, § 5293, giving mechanics a lien on any "building" to the extent of the labor done and materials furnished therefor, is not to be construed to mean necessarily a completed building; but the mechanic is entitled to a lien, though the owner suspends building operations and fails to complete the structure. Scott v. Goldinghorst, 24 N. E. 333, 334, 123 Ind. 268.

Lightning rods.

The term "building," in a statute giving a mechanic's lien to every mechanic or to the person who shall do any labor upon, or furnish any material, machinery, or fixtures for, any building, erection, or improvement upon land, includes lightning rods. Harris v. Schultz, 21 N. W. 22, 64 Iowa, 539.

Furnishing materials and labor in placing a lightning rod on a house is not furnishing materials and labor in "building, altering, repairing, or ornamenting" a house, in the sense those terms are used in the mechanic's lien law. Drew v. Mason, 81 Ill. 498, 499, 25 Am. Rep. 288.

Lime kiln.

The word "building" means a fabric or edifice, such as a house, church, or the like, and does not include a lime kiln, built of stone and brick; in other words, a roofless stack 19 feet square at its base. A base built of solid masonry is a permanent structure, yet no one would call it a building. The stack intended for a furnace is a permanent structure, yet, considered singly and alone, without reference to any building attached to it, it is simply a stack, not a building, within the meaning of the mechanic's lien law. It is only a building when connected with a casting house or foundry, in connection with it and constituting part of an entire erection. Cowdrick v. Morris, 9 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 312, 314.

Machinery.

A statute giving a mechanic's lien for materials furnished and services rendered in the construction of any building construed not to include a placing of machinery for manufacturing paper in a building erected as a paper mill. Rose v. Persee & Brooks Paper Works, 29 Conn. 256, 268.

In statutes giving a mechanic's lien to any one who shall build or repair, in whole or in part, a house, fixtures, or improvements, or shall furnish materials in such building or repairing, does not include the furnishing of machinery to be used in a building for manufacturing purposes. East Tennessee Iron Mfg. Co. v. Bynum, 35 Tenn. (3 Sneed) 268, 269, 64 Am. Dec. 56.

"Building" includes burr millstones, furnished like any other part of the machinery, rendering them subject to a mechanic's lien. Wademan v. Thorp (Pa.) 5 Watts, 115, 118.

Oil refinery.

"Buildings," as used in Act June 16, 1836, giving laborers and materialmen and contractors a lien on the buildings on which the labor and material was employed, means buildings sufficiently substantial to entitle them to the character of buildings, though the act does not designate the character. A boiler house, filter house, barrel house, tank house, pump house, tool house, etc., the whole forming a plant known as an "oil refinery," though of extremely simple character, yet if permanent and suited to their purpose, are "buildings," within the meaning of the act. Short v. Miller, 14 Atl. 374, 120 Pa. 470.

Oil tank.

The term "building," in the mechanic's lien statute, does not include oil tanks, although they may be included within the broad meaning of the word, because they are something erected or constructed on land. Selders & Co. International Boiler Works v. Lewis, 21 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 80.

Portable steam engine.

Gen. Laws, c. 139, § 11, providing that any person performing labor or furnishing materials for erecting, altering, or repairing a house or building, or appurtenances, should have a lien thereon, cannot be construed to include a portable steam engine. Thompson Mfg. Co. v. Smith, 29 Atl. 405, 406, 67 N. H. 409, 68 Am. St. Rep. 679.

Railroad.

A railroad is not a building or structure, within the meaning of the South Carolina mechanic's lien law, and is not subject to such liens. Greenwood, A. & W. Ry. v. Strang (U. S.) 77 Fed. 498, 499.

Sidewalk.

A statute giving a lien in favor of mechanics for work performed toward the erection, construction, or finishing of buildings, cannot be construed to include flagging the sidewalks, yards, and approaches of buildings which are being erected. McDermott v. Palmer, 8 N. Y. (4 Seld.) 383, 386.

2 Gav. & H. St. p. 298, § 697, giving mechanics and all persons performing labor or furnishing materials for the "construction or repair of any building" a lien on the same, etc., does not include the making of a pavement in front of a lot. Knaube v. Kerchner, 39 Ind. 217, 218.

Swing or seat in hall.

Code, §§ 1183, 1192, authorizing a mechanic's lien on buildings or structures, etc., does not cover swings or seats in a dancing hall. Lothian v. Wood, 55 Cal. 159, 163.

Wall.

A wall built around three sides of an iron furnace, and at the distance of a few feet from it, in order to protect it from the possible sliding down of earth from a hill, at the foot of which it stands, is not a building, within the meaning of St. 1851, c. 343, giving a mechanic's lien for labor performed in erecting, altering or repairing any building. The word "building" cannot be held to include every species of erection on land, such as fences, gates, or other like structures. Taken in its broadest sense, it can mean only an erection intended for use and occupation as a habitation, or for some purpose of trade, manufacture, ornament, or use, constituting a fabric or edifice, such as a house, a store, a church, a shed. Truesdell v. Gay, 79 Mass. (13 Gray) 311, 312.

BUILDING (In Revenue Laws).

According to Webster a building is "that which is built; a fabric or edifice constructed, as a house, a church, etc." This definition was adopted in construing the word as used in mechanic's lien law in Coddington v. Hudson County Dry Dock & Wet Dock Co., 31 N. J. Law (2 Vroom) 477; and neither a tent nor a frame tenement used for a kitchen and laundry, without any accommodations for sleeping or for the care and shelter of the objects of a charity, are buildings within a statute exempting such buildings from taxation. Children's Seashore House for Invalid Children v. Atlantic City, 53 Atl. 399, 401, 68 N. J. Law, 385, 59 L. R. A. 947.

Everything that is necessary to perfect a manufacturing establishment and fit it for the uses designed is a part of it, and falls within the term "building" under the general revenue laws. Patterson v. Delaware County, 70 Pa. (20 P. F. Smith) 381, 384.

Land occupied included.

"Building," as used in Const. 1876, exempting from taxation any building used exclusively for school purposes, includes both the structure and the land on which it stands. Cassiano v. Ursuline Academy, 64 Tex. 673, 676.

Within the meaning of the statute which makes it the duty of the auditor to transfer for taxation in the name of the owner lands, town lots, and parts thereof, which have been conveyed, a building, whenever it is a permanent improvement, is "land," for the purpose of taxation, and the words "part thereof" may apply to the improvement, as well as to the lot on which it stands, and may consist of a part of the building by metes and bounds, or definite description of a separate part, or of an individual aliquot part of the whole, provided the conveyance in terms conveys the ownership in the estate which is liable to be assessed; and it is immaterial whether the building be divided by such conveyance by vertical lines or horizontal lines. On a conveyance of the second story of a building, it is the duty of the auditor to transfer such part of the building to the new owner. Cincinnati College v. Yeatmen, 30 Ohio St. 276, 282.

Wholly or partially destroyed building.

In St. 1894, c. 391, § 1, providing that no building for the storage of petroleum shall be erected without license, the term "building" does not apply to a case where a building worth $3,000 was burned down, and the value of the remaining material for use in a new building was $1,450, but the owner was entitled to rebuild without a license; the word "building" often being held to include partly destroyed or unfinished structures. City of Somerville v. Walker, 47 N. E. 127, 168 Mass. 388.

BUILDING AND LOAN ASSOCIATION.

See "National Building and Loan Association"; "Permanent Association."

A building association is a species of partnership for dealing in money. Appeal of Criswell, 100 Pa. 488, 490 (approving Becket v. Uniontown Building & Loan Ass'n, 88 Pa. 211, 216).

A building and loan association is an organization created for the purpose of accumulating a fund by the monthly subscriptions and savings of its members to assist them in building or purchasing for themselves dwellings or real estate by loan to them of the requisite money from the funds of the society upon good security. McCauley v. Workingman's Bldg. & Sav. Ass'n, 37 S. W. 212, 213, 97 Tenn. (13 Pickle) 421, 35 L. R. A. 244, 56 Am. St. Rep. 813; Rhodes v. Missouri Savings & Loan Co., 50 N. E. 998, 1000, 173 Ill. 621, 42 L. R. A. 93.

A building and loan association is "a private corporation, erected for such a period of time as may be permitted by the laws under which it is incorporated, for the accumulation, from fixed periodical contributions of its shareholders and the profits upon their investment, of a fund to be applied from time to time in accommodating such shareholders with loans or advancements, for the purpose, primarily, of acquiring the free possession of real estate, and constructing dwellings, under terms and regulations sanctioned by experience and prescribed by legislation and the charter and by-laws of the association, upon principles of strict mutuality and equality of benefits and obligations, with the effect of gradually extinguishing the liability incurred from such loans and advancements simultaneously with the prescribed continuance of the shareholder's periodical contributions upon the stock held by him in the association; the said periodical contributions being so calculated as to amount, in the aggregate, at compound interest, to the par value of all the shares, as agreed upon at the formation of the society and fixed by its charter, within the period allowed for the anticipated duration of the society, or the continuance of the contributions, after deduction of all the necessary expenses of the business." Endlich, Bldg. Ass'ns, § 39. The societies in this country were first organized under the plan evolved in England. Lord Chancellor Cranworth, describing their operations in that country under the provisions of Act 6 & 7, Wm. IV, c. 32, §§ 1, 3-5, says: "Members subscribe monthly sums, which are accumulated till the fund is sufficient to give a stipulated sum to each member, and then the whole is divided among them. In the society now in question, the sum to be raised for each member is £100. If this were all, it would be a very simple transaction, mere accumulation, and the only question would be how to invest the sums subscribed to the greatest advantage. But this is not all. One main object is to enable members to obtain their £100 by anticipation on their allowing a large discount. For this purpose, when a sufficient fund is in the hands of a treasurer, the members who desire to get their shares in advance bid by a sort of auction the sum which they are ready to allow as a discount, and the highest bidder obtains the discount. Thus, if at the end of a year a sum of £500 is in the hands of the treasurer arising from the monthly subscriptions, and the holder of 10 shares is willing to allow a discount of 50 per cent. (no one offering more), the £500 is or may be advanced to him, being £50 in satisfaction of each of his 10 shares. For this accommodation he is bound to pay monthly till a fund is raised sufficient to give £100 per share to all the other members, not only the original monthly subscription, but also a further monthly sum, called 'redemption money.' Washington Nat. Building, Loan & Investment Ass'n v. Stanley, 63 Pac. 489, 492, 38 Or. 319, 84 Am. St. Rep. 793 (citing Fleming v. Self, 3 De Gex, M. & G. 997, 1012).

A building and loan association is a "private corporation for gain, erected for such time, limited or unlimited, as may be permitted by the laws under which it is incorporated, for the accumulation, from fixed periodical contributions of its shareholders, in payment of the stock subscribed by them, the penalties for their nonpayment, and the profits upon their investment, of a fund to be applied from time to time in accommodating such shareholders with loans or advancements, primarily for the purpose of acquiring the free possession of real estate, or constructing dwellings, or both, under terms and regulations prescribed by legislation, or reasonably and lawfully ordained by charter and by-laws of the association, upon principles of strict mutuality and equality of benefits and obligations, with the effect of extinguishing the liability incurred for such loans and advancements simultaneously with the termination of the shareholder's periodical contributions upon the stock held by him in the association; the object of the latter being completed when the fund raised is sufficient to distribute to each member the par value of all shares subscribed by him and held without loans, and to extinguish all loans held by shareholders." Albany Mut. Bldg. Ass'n v. City of Laramie (Wyo.) 65 Pac. 1011, 1013.

A building and loan association is a private corporation, designed for the accumulation by the members of their money by periodical payments into its treasury, to be invested from time to time in loans to the members upon real estate for the same purposes, the borrowing members paying interest and premiums as a preference in securing loans over other members, and continuing their fixed periodical payments in addition, all of which payments, together with the nonborrower's payments, including fines for failure to pay such fixed installments thereafter or for such continued failure of such payments fees for transferring stock, membership fees required upon the entrance of a member into the society, and such other revenues go into the common fund until such time as that the installment, payments, and profits aggregate the face value of all the shares in the association, when the assets, after the payment of expenses and losses, are prorated among all members, which in legal effect cancels the borrower's debts and gives the nonborrower the amount of his stock. Cook v. Equitable Building & Loan Ass'n, 30 S. E. 911, 914, 104 Ga. 814; Albany Mut. Bldg. Ass'n v. City of Laramie (Wyo.) 65 Pac. 1011, 1013; Washington Nat. Building, Loan & Investment Ass'n v. Stanley, 63 Pac. 489, 492, 38 Or. 319, 84 Am. St. Rep. 793; Fleming v. Self, 3 De Gex, M. & G. 997, 1012.

Endlich on Building Associations, at section 517, described incorporated building associations as incorporated partnerships. In Towle v. American Building, Loan & Investment Soc. (U. S.) 61 Fed. 446, it is said: "These associations are essentially corporate partnerships. They have no function except to gather together from small stated contributions sums large enough to justify loans. Their officers are the agents of every stockholder. They have no debtors, no creditors, except the stockholders, and whether a stockholder is a creditor or debtor depends on whether he has exercised his privilege of borrowing money from the common fund." In Security Savings & Loan Ass'n v. Elbert, 153 Ind. 198, 54 N. E. 753, our Supreme Court adopted the foregoing view, that the relation existing between the members of a building association is that of a quasi partnership. Union Mut. Building & Loan Ass'n v. Aichele, 61 N. E. 11, 12, 28 Ind. App. 69.

"It is true, so far as I know, that unincorporated building societies have not existed in this country to any great extent, except in Massachusetts and Pennsylvania, because of the facility with which acts of incorporation of such societies and of companies generally can be procured in this country; but it is far otherwise in England. There these unincorporated building societies existed and flourished for many years before there was any law proposed which permitted them to become incorporated. Such a building club is mentioned as having existed in Birmingham as early as 1795, but nothing is really known about its operations. As early as 1809 one is certainly known to have existed in Greenwich. About 1815 the Earl of Selkirk, from purely benevolent motives, started these building societies in Scotland. They were merely private and unincorporated associations, and were eminently successful, because of the beneficial influence which they exerted on the industrial classes." Pfeister v. Wheeling Bldg. Ass'n, 19 W. Va. 676, 693.

Mutuality is the essential principle of a building association. Its business is confined to its own members; its object being to raise a fund to loan among themselves, or such as may desire to avail themselves of the privilege. This is done by the payment at stated times of small sums in the way of dues, interest on loans, and premiums for loans. Each shareholder, whether a borrower or nonborrower, participates alike in the earnings of the association, and alike assists in bearing the burden of losses sustained. It has what is called a "capital stock." This is only true in a modified sense. Unlike other corporations for profit, a share in a building association has at its inception only a nominal value. Its value is expected to increase by the lapse of time and the success of the association. Eversmann v. Schmitt, 41 N. E. 139, 141, 53 Ohio St. 174, 29 L. R. A. 184, 53 Am. St. Rep. 632.

The name "building and loan association," as used in the act relating to building, loan, and savings associations, includes all corporations, societies, organizations, or associations doing a saving and loan or investment business on the building society plan, whether mutual or otherwise, and whether issuing certificates of stock which mature at a fixed time in advance or not. Gen. St. Minn. 1894, § 2876; Pub. St. N. H. 1901, p. 558, c. 166, § 2; Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St. Wash. 1897, § 4416.

A "building and loan association," as used in the chapter relating to building and loan associations, is a corporation for the purpose of raising money to be loaned among its members. Associations organized under the laws of this state shall be known in this act as "domestic associations," and those organized under the laws of another state or territory, as "foreign associations." Bates' Ann. St. Ohio 1904, § 3836-1.

The name "building and loan association," as used in an act for the regulation and inspection of building and loan associations, includes all corporations, societies, organizations, or associations doing business in this state under a building and loan charter or engaging in a building and loan business. Shannon's Code Tenn. 1896, § 2159.

The name "building and loan association," as used in the chapter relating to mutual building and loan associations, shall include all societies, organizations, or associations doing a saving and loan or investment business on the building association plan, whether mutual or otherwise, and whether issuing certificates of stock or bonds, or any other evidence of indebtedness, whether the time of maturity be fixed or not. Rev. St. Wis. 1899, §§ 2014-2022.

As a corporate partnership.

In Towle v. American Building, Loan & Investment Soc. (U. S.) 61 Fed. 446, it is said that building associations "are essentially corporate partnerships. They have no function, except to gather together from small stated contributions sums large enough to justify loans. Their officers are the agents of every stockholder. They have no debtors, no creditors, and whether a stockholder is a debtor or creditor depends on whether he has exercised his privilege of borrowing money from the common fund." This doctrine was adopted in Security Savings & Loan Ass'n v. Elbert, 153 Ind. 198, 54 N. E. 753, that the relation between the members and the association was that of a quasi partnership, whose members share in the profits and losses. The shares are matured by payment of dues and accumulation of property, and can only reach par value when the payment of dues and accumulation of property have reached the actual value of $100 per share. A stockholder withdrawing can only withdraw what he has actually paid on each share, and not the par value of such share. Union Mut. Building & Loan Ass'n v. Aichele, 61 N. E. 11, 12, 28 Ind. App. 69.

As a savings institution.

A building association cannot, without a manifest abuse of the term, be denominated a "savings institution," and is not included within the exceptions of Act June 7, 1879, exempting from certain taxes "foreign insurance companies, banks, and savings institutions." Bourguignon Bldg. Ass'n v. Commonwealth, 98 Pa. 54, 64.

BUILDING AND LOAN STOCK.

"Building and loan stock" is stock held by those who make stated payments to the association in return for money borrowed by them from the association, and by such borrowers invested in the building or buying of homes. Deniston v. Terry, 41 N. E. 143, 144, 141 Ind. 677.

BUILDING CONTRACT.

"A contract," says Mr. Lloyd, in his work on the Law of Building and Buildings, § 1, "is an agreement between two or more persons for a valuable consideration to do or not to do some particular thing, and, when the undertaking refers to constructing, erecting, or repairing an edifice or other work or structure, it may be called a building contract." Utah Lumber Co. v. James, 71 Pac. 986, 987, 25 Utah, 434 (citing City of Lake View v. MacRitchie, 134 Ill. 203, 25 N. E. 663).

The term "building contracts" is properly used to designate contracts for work or materials in erecting and building, etc., for which work and materials the contractor is entitled to a mechanic's lien. Carey-Lombard Lumber Co. v. Jones, 58 N. E. 347, 349, 187 Ill. 203.

BUILDING FOR PUBLIC WORSHIP.

See, also, "Public Worship."

A statute exempting from taxation every building for public worship and the several lots whereon such buildings are situated does not include a cemetery and the keeper's house, and a chapel erected thereon for religious service at interments. Trinity Church v. City of New York, 10 How. Prac. 138.

The term "building for public worship," in a statute exempting a building for public worship, was construed not to include a church building, not used for religious purposes, and owned by a private person and situated on property owned by him. Black v. City of Brooklyn, 4 N. Y. Supp. 78, 51 Hun, 581.

BUILDING FOR RELIGIOUS WORSHIP.

See "Religious Worship."

BUILDING GROUND.

"Building ground," as used in a conveyance to plaintiff, by which the land was described as bounded by building ground belonging to another grantee of the same grantor, was a loose and general expression, which might be satisfied as well by the power of erecting a building, which would leave the plaintiff's rights altogether undisturbed, or partially obstructed only, or altogether blocked up; but, on its appearing that there had been on the building ground in question for a long period of time, and only recently demolished, a building which extended only to the height of the first floor of the plaintiff's house, this gave the limit and extent intended by the terms in the description. Swansborough v. Coventry, 9 Bing. 305, 310.

BUILDING LIEN.

See "Building (In Lien Laws)."

A building or mechanic's lien is purely statutory. Its character, operation, and extent must be ascertained by the terms of the statute creating and defining it. A mechanic's lien in favor of a principal contractor grows out of the contractual relations between the owner of the property improved or his authorized agent and such principal contractor, and the right authority is based upon contract for the purpose of securing debts due thereunder. Rust-Owen Lumber Co. v. Holt, 82 N. W. 112, 113, 60 Neb. 80, 83 Am. St. Rep. 512.

BUILDING MATERIALS.

Lumber, being timber sawed or split for use in building and material essential for building any kind of a house ordinarily used for business or by families, is included in the term "building material." Ward v. Kadel, 38 Ark. 174, 180.

A city ordinance prohibiting any person from placing any materials for building in any street will not be construed to apply to dirt excavated for the foundation of a building and which is not to be used in the construction thereof. Hundhausen v. Bond, 36 Wis. 29, 36.

A fire insurance policy on the lumber and building materials contained in a shipyard should be construed to cover timbers not united to the keel or structure thereon of a contemplated bark, though they are intended and completely prepared to be used in its framework, are lying in the yard in the proper place to be conveniently applied to that use, and are valueless for any other vessel. They are materials until they actually become a part of the structure of the ship. Hood v. Manhattan Fire Ins. Co., 11 N. Y. (1 Kern.) 532, 540.

BUILDING PURPOSES.

A tax for heating and repairing purposes is a tax for school, and not for building, purposes. The latter words refer to the building of schoolhouses only, within the meaning of 3 Starr & C. Ann. St. p. 1194, limiting taxes levied in any one year to a certain per cent. for school purposes and a certain per cent. for building purposes. Chicago & A. R. Co. v. People, 45 N. E. 122, 123, 163 Ill. 616.

Where, in 3 Starr & C. Ann. St. p. 3706, par. 202, providing that the levy of school taxes shall not exceed a certain per cent. for educational purposes and a certain per cent. for building purposes, the words "building purposes" are special, and apply solely to the building of schoolhouses and matters incident thereto, while the words "for educational purposes" are general, and apply to all matters for which a board of directors may levy school taxes. O'Day v. People, 49 N. E. 504, 505, 171 Ill. 293.

BUILT AND IN OPERATION.

An agreement under which a tax was voted to aid in the construction of a railroad stipulated that it should be built and in operation on or about a certain date. This did not impose an obligation on the company to complete the road by the time named, but only that it should be "built and in operation"—so far completed that it was capable of use. Muscatine Western R. Co. v. Horton, 38 Iowa, 33, 43.

BUILT UP.

"Built up," as used in Act April 20, 1899 (P. L. 66), declaring it unlawful thereafter to establish or maintain any additional hospital in the built up portion of cities, should be construed in its ordinary and popular sense, and not as contradistinguished to rural and agricultural property. Commonwealth v. Pittsburg Charity Hospital, 47 Atl. 980, 982, 198 Pa. 270.

BULK.

See "In Bulk"; "Open Bulk."

"Bulk" is said to be that which is neither counted, weighed, nor measured. A sale by the bulk is the sale of a quantity such as it is, without measuring, counting, or weighing. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 3556, subd. 6.

As the term "bulk" is used in speaking of sales by sample, it indicates the entire quantity to be sold, which is supposed to be presented in quality by the sample, which is the basis of the sale. Reynolds v. Palmer (U. S.) 21 Fed. 433.

Where a testator made certain specific bequests to persons, and then provided that the bulk of his estate should be disposed of in a certain manner, the bulk of his estate referred to is testator's residuary estate, both real and personal. Cole v. Proctor (Tenn.) 54 S. W. 674, 676.

BULL—BULLOCK.

As a beef, see "Beef."

As cattle, see "Cattle."

A bull is an uncastrated male of the cattle species. State v. Royster, 65 N. C. 539.

Act 1869, making it unlawful for the owner of domestic animals of the "species bull" to allow them to run at large, applies to bulls of all kinds and descriptions, without reference to size, age, or quality; but it does not embrace cows, heifers, or steers. Oil v. Rowley, 69 Ill. 469, 472.

A bull is a male of the bovine genus of animals, and is not included in the term "cow," so that one indicted for stealing a cow could not be convicted of stealing a bull. State v. McMinn, 34 Ark. 160, 162.

"Bullock stealing," as used in St. 7 Geo. IV, c. 64, § 28, relating to allowances of rewards for the discovery of offenders, includes all cases of actual stealing of animals of that particular description, as ox, cow, heifer, etc. Rex v. Gillbrass, 7 Car. & P. 444.

Bulls and cows are not covered by a mortgage which undertakes to include one and two year old steers. Wyman v. Herard, 59 Pac. 1009, 1024, 9 Okl. 35.

BULLION.

See "Base Bullion"; "Crude Bullion."

Bullion is defined to be uncoined gold or silver in mass. Properly the precious metals are called "bullion" when smelted, and not perfectly refined, or when refined, but in bars or ingots, or in any form uncoined or in plate. Hope Min. Co. v. Kennon, 3 Mont. 35, 44.

The term "bullion," in Rev. St. § 2897, providing that upon an indictment for the theft of money it shall be sufficient to maintain the charge if it be proved that any bullion, money, notes, etc., were fraudulently embezzled, means uncoined gold and silver in the mass. Thalheim v. State, 20 South. 938, 948, 38 Fla. 169.

Where a contract for services provides that they should be paid for at a certain rate per month in gold bullion, the word "bullion" imports money, for which suit could be maintained without demand. It was argued that bullion was a specific article, it being merchandise; and the court said: "In the same sense coin may be regarded as merchandise; for it is not its coinage which makes it the standard by which other commodities are measured, but its intrinsic value in the markets of the world as a precious metal. The precious metals are adopted as the general medium of exchange, because they have in themselves an intrinsic value, being used for many purposes, are produced in nearly equal quantities at nearly equal cost, are portable and comparatively indestructible, and they have this value, coined or uncoined; for the stamp which government impresses upon the coin is simply a guaranty of its weight and fineness. 'Bullion,' when the word is used in a financial sense, for it has other meanings (Nare's Glossary, Ed. of 1872; Wedgwood's Eng. Etymology), imports uncoined gold and silver, either smelted, refined, or in the condition in which it is used for coining, and has from the earliest period been associated with or employed as a term denoting money. It is derived from the French word 'billion,' which Savary, in his Dictionnaire Universel de Commerce, defines as a term for money; * * * and one of the earliest English authorities upon those words that are derived from the French, Cotgrave, in his French and English Dictionary of 1632, defines 'bullion' as 'money; monnoye de billion.' Bayley, more than a century afterwards, defines it in his English Dictionary of 1763 as 'money having no stamp upon it'; and our own contemporary authority, Webster, says: 'The word is often used to denote gold and silver, coined and uncoined, when reckoned by weight and in mass, including especially foreign or uncurrent coin.' * * * Locke, in his paper on Raising the Value of Money, so employs the word in this passage: 'Foreign coin hath no value here for its stamp, and our coin is bullion in foreign countries.' In France 'bullion' is used not only for coin, and for the material before it is coined, but also for the mint or place where the precious metals are sent to be coined (Bescherelle Dictionnaire Universel de la Langue Francaise); and 'bullion' was formerly used in this sense in England." Counsel v. Vulture Min. Co. of Arizona, 5 Daly, 74, 77 (citing Wedgw. Dict. Eng. Etymology, p. 112; 2 St. 27 Edw. III, c. 14; St. 4 Hen. IV, c. 10).

BUNCO.

Evidence that defendant, learning that the prosecuting witness had $4,000 deposited in his wife's name, gained his confidence and took him to a lottery shop, where, after being induced by defendant to try his luck, he was allowed to draw a prize of $4,000, but was told, when he demanded it, that he must first draw an equal amount of money; that defendant went with him to get the money, and after his wife, in whose name it was deposited, had drawn it, returned with them to the lottery shop at the time agreed on, where they found another man in charge, who said that the man in charge when the prize was drawn had gone to get the money; that this new man, and also defendant, told the wife that she must give the money to her husband and go out of the shop, as women are not allowed in it; and that witness and his wife, suspecting a trick, went away—makes it plain to a certainty that the defendant was doing his best to defraud the witness of his money by playing a confidence game, and its name is "bunco," as defined by the dictionaries. People v. Mason, 45 Pac. 182, 183, 113 Cal. 76.

BUNCO STEERER.

Any person or persons who shall, by means of any scheme, trick, device, practice, or deception, entice or induce, or attempt to entice or induce, any person into any gambling house, club rooms, variety show, lottery office, beer hall, or any other place, for the purpose and with intent to procure or obtain, or to attempt to procure or obtain, from such person any money or other valuable thing by means of any game or games, lottery, or gift enterprise of any kind, or by means of any fraudulent pretense, scheme, trick, device, or deception, shall be deemed a bunco steerer. Mills' Ann. St. Colo. 1891, § 1398.

BURDEN.

The word "burden," in a deed to a lot by a city, which provides that the holders shall be subject to all such assessments and burdens as might be imposed on other lot holders of the city, is sufficiently comprehensive to include municipal taxes. "Taken altogether, the language adopted is clearly broad enough to embrace every burden then existing or which might thereafter be lawfully imposed upon other landowners in the city." Wells v. City of Savannah, 21 Sup. Ct. 697, 701, 181 U. S. 531, 45 L. Ed. 986; Id., 32 S. C. 669, 670, 107 Ga. 1.

Of vessel.

A statute enacted that, after a ferry should be established, no other ferry should be set up and used by any person, and, if any person other than those operating the ferry established by the statute should use any boat or vessel of the burden of four tons or upward, they should forfeit a certificate. Held, that the word "burden" did not register admeasurement, but the carrying capacity. North & S. S. Ferry Co. v. Baker, 2 Wel., Hurl. & G. 136, 147.

BURDEN OF PROOF.

The fundamental rule as to burden of proof, as given by Stephen, Ev. (Am. Ed.) 175, is that, whenever the existence of any fact is necessary in order that a party may make out his case or establish a defense, the burden is on such party to show the existence of such facts; that whoever desires any court to give a judgment as to any legal right or liability, dependent on the existence or nonexistence of facts, which he asserts or denies to exist, he must prove that those facts do or do not exist in order to be entitled to the relief. Willett v. Rich, 142 Mass. 356, 357, 7 N. E. 776, 56 Am. Rep. 684.

The term "burden of proof" means that the burden is coextensive with the legal proposition sought to be proven, and it applies to every fact which is essential to or necessarily involved in the proposition. It does not apply to facts relied on in defense to establish an independent proposition, however inconsistent such proposition may be with that on which the plaintiff's case depends. If the defendant furnish proof on an independent proposition which is inconsistent with that on which the plaintiff's case rests, the burden is on the plaintiff not to disprove those particular facts, nor the proposition which they tend to establish, but to maintain the proposition on which his own case rests, notwithstanding the defendant's testimony, and on the whole evidence in the case. Wilder v. Cowles, 100 Mass. 487, 490.

The burden of proof is often spoken of as an equivalent to the duty of introducing evidence to meet or overcome a prima facie case, and, where the court is asked to instruct the jury that by the proof of certain facts the burden was cast on defendant, complainant in fact seeks to have the court tell the jury that such facts constitute a prima facie case for complainant. Michael v. Marshall, 66 N. E. 273, 275, 201 Ill. 70.

The strict meaning of the term "onus probandi" is that, if the party who has the burden of proof does not offer any evidence in the cause, the issues must be found against him. Davis v. Rogers (Del.) 1 Houst. 44, 95; Evans v. Arnold, 52 Ga. 169, 180; Roberts v. Crawford, 54 N. H. 532, 534 (citing Kendall v. Brownson, 47 N. H. 186, 197); Baldwin v. Parker, 99 Mass. 79, 87, 96 Am. Dec. 697.

"By the onus probandi is meant the obligation imposed upon a party who alleges the existence of a fact or thing necessary in the prosecution or defense of an action to establish it by proof. It may be proved by the production of evidence in the usual way, or the law under certain circumstances in certain cases may presume its existence without proof." People v. McCann, 16 N. Y. 58, 66, 69 Am. Dec. 642; Id., 15 How. Prac. 503, 514.

The rule of burden of proof cannot be made to depend upon the order of proof, or upon the particular mode in which the evidence is introduced. Commonwealth v. McKie, 67 Mass. (1 Gray) 61, 64, 61 Am. Dec. 410. The burden of proof and the weight of evidence are two very different things. The former remains on the party affirming a fact in support of his case, and is not changed in any aspect of the cause, except by legal presumption; the latter shifts from side to side in the progress of the trial, according to the nature and strength of the proof offered in support or denial of a main fact to be established. Kendall v. Brownson, 47 N. H. 186, 200.

The term "burden of proof" is used in different senses. Sometimes it is used to signify the burden of meeting a prima facie case, and sometimes the burden of producing a preponderance of evidence. The two burdens are distinct things. One may shift back and forth with the ebb and flow of the testimony. The other remains with the party on whom it is cast by the pleadings; that is, with the party who has the affirmative of the issue. All that is meant, however, by the phrase "shifting of the burden of proof," is that the party having the burden has produced sufficient evidence to establish a prima facie case, and that there is a necessity of evidence to answer the same or it will prevail. The burden, however, of maintaining the affirmative of the issue involved in the action, is on the party alleging the fact which constitutes the issue, and this burden remains where it is placed according to the pleadings throughout the trial. Jones v. Prospect Mountain Tunnel Co., 31 Pac. 642, 644, 21 Nev. 339. "If, upon the making of a prima facie case, the burden shifts to the other side, then it would follow that, when the prima facie case is overthrown, the burden shifts back again. To say that the burden thus shifts is to say that it is constantly shifting from the stronger to the weaker side, as the testimony may make one side or the other stronger." Carver v. Carver, 97 Ind. 497, 511.

Where a party during the progress of a trial gives evidence sufficient to establish his allegation prima facie, it is sometimes said that the burden of proof is shifted. What is meant by this, however, is only that there is a necessity of evidence to answer the prima facie case, or it will prevail. The burden of maintaining the affirmative of the issue involved in the action is upon the party alleging the fact which constitutes the issue, and this burden remains throughout the trial. Heinemann v. Heard, 62 N. Y. 448, 455.

The "burden of proof" means the burden of establishing a case, and the well-settled law is that such burden remains unchangeably throughout the entire case exactly where the pleadings originally placed it. The burden of proof, in the sense of the "burden of the evidence," may shift constantly, as the evidence is introduced by one side or the other—as one scale preponderates over its fellow; but, when all the evidence is in, it is legally necessary to action by the tribunal that the final balance be one way. This necessity does not at any time shift, but remains constantly throughout the trial on one of the parties alone, to wit, on him who had the affirmative. This is the burden of establishing—the burden of proof. Feurt v. Ambrose, 34 Mo. App. 360, 366.

An accepted definition of "burden of proof," propounded by our own court of highest authority, is: "The obligation imposed on the party who alleges the existence of the fact or thing necessary in the prosecution or defense of an action to establish it by proof." Siefke v. Siefke, 3 Misc. Rep. 81, 84, 22 N. Y. Supp. 546 (citing People v. McCann, 16 N. Y. 58, 66, 69 Am. Dec. 642).

The phrase "burden of proof" is employed and has been used from time immemorial by every judge to indicate how the carriage of a case passes from one side to the other. By it is meant, when it is said that the defendant has the burden of proof, either his evidence to a refutation of the plaintiff's version, or to the establishment of facts which would avoid liability or explain the case as made by the plaintiff. It is thus used in relation to cases of accidents which speak for themselves as indicating the negligence of defendant. Where it is said that, on proof of an accident, the plaintiff had established a prima facie case when he rested, and the burden was then on defendant. Kay v. Metropolitan St. R. Co., 51 N. Y. Supp. 724, 727, 29 App. Div. 466.

As a general proposition, the burden of proof in respect to the different parts of a case may be determined by reference to the pleadings, the plaintiff being bound to prove, if denied, what he has affirmed in his answer; but, beyond the reply, with which, under the Code, pleading stops, the question must be determined by the nature of the evidence and its relation to the case, the burden of rebutting being on the defendant, of surrebutting on the plaintiff, and in actions of replevin, ejectment, or the like, wherein the pleadings do or may end with the complaint and an answer in denial, the burden of the evidence is upon the party who, if special pleading were required, would be bound to allege the particular matter sought to be proven. Fay v. Burditt, 81 Ind. 433, 443, 42 Am. Rep. 142.

Strictly speaking, the "burden of proof," as these words are understood in the criminal law, is never upon the accused to establish his innocence or to disprove the facts necessary to establish the crime for which he is indicted. It is on the prosecution from the beginning to the end, and applies to every element necessary to constitute the crime. Where the defense is insanity, the vital question, from the time a plea of not guilty is entered until the return of the verdict, is whether, on all the evidence, by whatever side adduced, guilt is established beyond reasonable doubt. If the whole evidence, including that specified by the presumption of sanity, does not exclude beyond reasonable doubt the hypothesis of sanity, the accused is entitled to an acquittal. Davis v. United States, 16 Sup. Ct. 353, 358, 160 U. S. 469, 40 L. Ed. 499.

In an action for personal injuries, the court charged that "the burden rests upon the plaintiff, even though the city was negligent. If he could have seen the defect which was here alleged, had he looked, and he did not look, he cannot recover in this action." It was contended that the use of the word "burden" was erroneous; but it was held that, while the word was perhaps not happily chosen, it was not inaccurate. The plaintiff was bound to make out a case clear of contributory negligence, and this may be properly described as a burden, though a negative one. Heiss v. City of Lancaster, 52 Atl. 201, 203 Pa. 260.

The "burden of proof," as used in an instruction that the burden of proof is on the defendant in proving the defense of alibi, does not imply that the defendant must prove his defense by such evidence as will satisfy a jury that his defense is true, but only that, after the prosecution has made out its case, it devolves upon the accused to introduce evidence, if he has any, to prove his alibi, if he relies upon such a defense. Wilburn v. Territory, 62 Pac. 968, 970, 10 N. M. 402.

The term "burden of proof" is, after all, and no matter how important it has become through unanimous adoption and use, a mere form and figure of speech. In re Appeal of Barber, 27 Atl. 973, 977, 63 Conn. 393, 22 L. R. A. 90.

Burden of evidence distinguished.

There is a manifest distinction between the "burden of evidence" and the "burden of proof." How far the burden of evidence may bear upon a party to litigation is usually more for the jury to determine as a matter of fact than for the ruling of the court as matter of law. Generally the burden of proof upon any affirmative proposition necessary to be established as the foundation of a suit does not shift from plaintiff to defendant, while the burden of evidence, or of the weight or preponderance of evidence, or the burden of explanation, may shift from one side to the other, according to the testimony. Buswell v. Fuller, 36 Atl. 1059 1060, 89 Me. 600.

Preponderance of evidence.

The burden of proof is that obligation resting on a plaintiff in a suit at law to establish to the satisfaction of the jury or court, by a preponderance of the evidence, reasonably satisfying the minds of the jury or court, by convincing proof of witnesses, that the defendant, whom the plaintiff has brought into court, is responsible for the loss or damage alleged to have been suffered by plaintiff. Gage v. Louisville, N. O. & T. Ry. Co., 14 S. W. 73, 74, 88 Tenn. (4 Pickle) 724.

It is the well-settled rule that the burden of proof, which is charged upon the person who asserts the fact, requires that the jury shall be satisfied from the whole case that the fact is proved, and if, from the whole case, the jury are not satisfied that the fact is established, the asserting party fails in bearing the burden. An instruction that if the jury should find the theory of the plaintiff more acceptable, more probable, and more consistent than the theory advanced by the defendants, the rule requiring plaintiff to establish his case by the burden of proof has been satisfied, is erroneous. "It might well be that one theory of a case was more acceptable, more probable, and more consistent than the other, and yet be unsupported by a preponderance of evidence, or so far supported by the evidence as to entitle the party to recover, or it might well be that one theory of a case was more acceptable, probable, and consistent than another, and yet neither be sufficiently supported to warrant a finding that either theory was proven." Rommeney v. City of New York, 63 N. Y. Supp. 186, 189, 49 App. Div. 64.

Where a party avers a thing, which is denied by his opponent, the party who avers the fact to exist must take upon himself the trouble or burden of proving it; and, when the burden of proof is upon a party, he is bound to establish the fact which he alleges, and which the other party denies, by a preponderance of the evidence. Parker v. Hull, 37 N. W. 351, 352, 71 Wis. 368, 5 Am. St. Rep. 224.

The term "burden of proof" may be used to indicate the burden which rests on every party to a cause presenting a claim for relief, or pleading in avoidance, of going forward, if he be met by a traverse, and establishing what is well defined by an authoritative writer on the law of evidence as "the total proposition or series of propositions which constitute his disputed case" (Thayer, Prelim. Treatise Ev. 380). It may also be used to denote a duty cast by law upon one party to meet and rebut the effect of some piece of evidence introduced by the other by proof of what may suffice to overbear it in the mind of the trier. Baxter v. Camp, 41 Atl. 803, 805, 71 Conn. 245, 42 L. R. A. 514, 71 Am. St. Rep. 169.

Weight of evidence distinguished.

"The burden of proof and the weight of evidence are two very different things. The former remains on the party affirming a fact in support of his case, and does not change in any aspect of the cause. The latter shifts from side to side in the progress of the trial, according to the nature and strength of the proofs offered in support or denial of the main fact to be established." Scott v. Wood, 22 Pac. 871, 872, 81 Cal. 398; Central Bridge Corp. v. Butler, 68 Mass. (2 Gray) 130, 132.

"Burden of proof should not be confounded with weight of evidence, since the former is a rule of law, while the latter is one of fact. The one belongs to the court; the other, to the jury. Whether the burden of proof as to a certain fact is on the plaintiff or defendant, the court will determine on the settled rules of judicial evidence, one of which is that the burden of maintaining any issue of fact rests on him who, from the nature and character of the fact, has or might have peculiar evidence thereon." Little Pittsburg Con. Min. Co. v. Little Chief Min. Co., 17 Pac. 760, 765, 11 Colo. 223, 7 Am. St. Rep. 226.

The term "burden of proof" is properly applied only to a party affirming some fact essential to the support of his case, and with regard to the necessary allegations to support such case the burden never shifts during the trial. The term "burden of proof" is often confounded with weight of evidence, which may shift from one side to the other as facts and presumptions appear from the testimony and are overcome by other evidence or presumptions. Pease v. Cole, 22 Atl. 681, 686, 53 Conn. 53, 55 Am. Rep. 53.

BUREAU.

See "Head of Bureau."

A bureau is an article of household furniture used for domestic purposes, and generally belongs to the ladies' department of the household government, and the ordinary use of a stand of bureaus is not for the purpose of holding and securing such things as a life insurance policy, though they may often be used for that purpose; hence the gift of the bureau would not carry with it the insurance policy. Newman v. Bost, 29 S. E. 848, 849, 122 N. C. 524.

BUREAU OF CONSCRIPTION.

The bureau of conscription was a branch of the war department of the Confederate states. In re Strawbridge, 39 Ala. 367, 375

BURGEE.

A "burgee" is defined by lexicographers to be "a distinguishing flag or pennant." The Stephen Hart (U. S.) 22 Fed. Cas. 1253, 1269.

BURGERALLY.

A jury trying a defendant for burglary returned a verdict finding accused guilty of "Burgerally and theft." Held, that the words quoted in the verdict described no offense, as there was no such word as "Burgerally," nor was it idem sonans with "burglary." The verdict, therefore, was unintelligible and void. Haney v. State, 2 Tex. App. 504, 505.

BURGESS.

The word "burgess," as used in a charter providing that the mayor was to be annually elected by the burgesses of the borough, did not mean only capital burgesses, but applied to all. Rex v. Goldsmith, 4 Barn. & Adol. 835.

BURGLAR.

"A burglar is by the common law a felon that in the nighttime breaketh and entereth into a mansion house of another, of intent to kill some reasonable creature, or to commit some felony within the same, whether his felonious intent be executed or not" (Coke). Wilson v. State, 34 Ohio St. 199, 200; State v. McDaniel, 60 N. C. 245, 248; People v. McCloskey (N. Y.) 5 Parker, Cr. R. 57, 60;

Armour v. State, 22 Tenn. (3 Humph.) 379, 385; Wilson v. State, 34 Ohio St. 199, 200 (citing 1 Hale, P. C. 556); Robinson v. State, 53 Md. 151, 153, 36 Am. Rep. 399.

A burglar is one who breaks into a house with intent to commit a crime, even though but little force be used in the breaking. O'Connor v. Press Pub. Co., 70 N. Y. Supp. 367, 368, 34 Misc. Rep. 564.

BURGLARIOUSLY.

The word "burglariously" is understood in the modern professional language as necessarily implying that the act characterized by the term was done in the night. Yet it is said in Jacob's Law Dictionary, under the title "Burglary," that originally the term signified only the robbery of a dwelling house, without any reference to the time when it was committed. Lewis v. State, 16 Conn. 32, 34.

Under Code Cr. Proc. art. 422, defining "burglary" as entering a house by force, threats, or fraud, at night, or, in like manner, by entering a house during the day and remaining concealed therein until night, with intent in either cause of committing felony or the crime of theft, the offense can be charged in an indictment without using the word "burglariously," and such word is not a term of art, in charging burglary, for which there is no substitute. Reed v. State, 14 Tex. App. 662, 665.

BURGLARIZE.

"Burglarize" is defined by standard English dictionaries to mean to "commit burglary upon," and is therefore the exact equivalent in meaning of the words "committed burglary," as used in the statute, and is sufficient in an indictment for conspiracy to burglarize. State v. Slutz, 30 South. 298, 300, 106 La. 182.

BURGLARY.

See "Burgerally"; "Burgurly."

See, also, "Breaking (In Criminal Law)."

Burglary is a combination of the Saxon term "burg," a house, and "laron," theft, and originally signified no more than the robbery of a dwelling, but is now defined to be breaking and entering the house of another in the nighttime with intent to commit a felony, whether the felony be actually committed or not. At common law the ownership of the house was essential to the offense. It was required that it should be the house of another. Under most statutes this is not so, and the character of the building broken and entered is all that is required, with such a description of the building as enables the state to identify it by the evidence for the prosecution. Anderson v. State, 48 Ala. 665, 666, 17 Am. Rep. 36.

At common law, burglary consisted of two kinds: (1) Simple burglary, which was committed the minute a breaking of the dwelling house was accomplished, with the intent, etc.; (2) a burglary complicated and mixed with another felony, such as burglary and larceny, committed at the same time. Cases of a burglarious entry with intent to steal, and the consummation of that intent by actual theft, are so connected as to practically amount to one crime, both of which may be charged in the same count of an indictment, except where prohibited by statute. State v. Smith, 52 N. W. 320, 321, 2 N. D. 515.

Burglary is the breaking and entering into the house of another with intent to commit a felony. Benson v. McMahon, 8 Sup. Ct. 1240, 1242, 127 U. S. 457, 32 L. Ed. 234; People v. St. Clair, 56 Cal. 406, 407; Temple v. People (N. Y.) 4 Lans. 119, 123; Hunter v. State, 29 Ind. 80, 81.

"Burglary" is defined by Pen. Code, § 46, to be an unlawful entry in the nighttime, or an unlawful breaking and entry in the daytime, with intent to commit a misdemeanor or a felony. State v. Hansen, 38 Pac. 1023, 1024, 10 Wash. 235.

"Burglary" is defined by Pen. Code Cal. § 459, as follows: "Every person who enters any house, room, apartment, tenement, shop, warehouse, store, mill, barn, stable, outhouse, or other building, tent, vessel, railroad car, with intent to commit grand or petty larceny, or any felony, is guilty of burglary." People v. Webber, 70 Pac. 1089, 138 Cal. 145.

"Burglary" is defined in 2 Ballinger's Ann Codes & St. § 7104, as unlawfully entering in the nighttime, or breaking and entering in the daytime, any dwelling house, or outhouse adjoining and occupied therewith, or any office, shop, store, warehouse, mill, factory, bank, church, railroad car, barn, stable, etc., in which goods, merchandise, or valuable things are kept for use, sale, or deposit, with intent to commit a misdemeanor or felony. The common-law definition of "burglary" is breaking and entering the dwelling house of another in the nighttime with intent to commit a felony. The simple idea of the common law which has obtained for hundreds of years, viz., the unlawful breaking and entering of some kind of an inclosed structure, has been retained by the statute, but the element of breaking in the nighttime has been dropped. State v. Petit, 72 Pac. 1021, 1022, 32 Wash. 129.

Every person who enters any house, room, apartment, tenement, or other building with intent to commit grand or petty larceny or any felony is guilty of burglary. People v. Goldsworthy, 62 Pac. 1074, 130 Cal. 600. Every burglary committed in the nighttime is burglary of the first degree, and every burglary committed in the daytime is burglary of the second degree. Taylor v. Territory (Ariz.) 64 Pac. 423.

Burglary is a disturbance, not of the fee of the burglarized building regarded as real estate, but of its habitable security. State v. Gilligan, 50 Atl. 844, 845, 23 R. I. 400. So that in burglary the word "ownership" means any rightful possession as against the burglar. Hence an accusation charging a larceny from the dwelling house of a person named is not sustained by proof that he was the owner in fee of a hotel, which he rented to and which was conducted by another, and that the theft was committed in a room of this hotel which was occupied by a guest of the latter. Trice v. State, 42 S. E. 1008, 116 Ga. 602.

Both breaking and entry necessary.

To constitute burglary, it is well settled that there must be both a breaking and entry, and an information is fatally defective which fails to charge both. State v. Whitby, 15 Kan. 402.

Consummation of intent.

Burglary is the breaking and entering a dwelling house of another in the nighttime with intent to commit a felony therein, whether the felonious intent be executed or not. State v. Fitzsimon, 27 Atl. 446, 447, 18 R. I. 236, 49 Am. St. Rep. 766; State v. Johnson, 34 La. Ann. 48, 49; Hamilton v. State, 11 Tex. App. 116, 121; Martin v. State, 1 Tex. App. 525, 529; People v. Phelan, 28 Pac. 855, 93 Cal. 111; People v. Barry, 29 Pac. 1026, 94 Cal. 481 (citing Russ. Crimes, 785); State v. Langford, 12 N. C. 253; State v. Meche, 7 South. 573, 574, 42 La. Ann. 273; Clarke v. Commonwealth, 25 Grat. 908, 912; People v. Edwards, 1 Wheeler, Cr. Cas. 371.

Burglary "is almost the only case where crime in the highest degree is not dependent on the consummation of the intent. In almost all other offenses there is a locus penitentia. But the law throws her mantle around the dwelling of man because it is the place of his repose, and protects not only the house in which he sleeps, but also all others appurtenant thereto, as parcel or part thereof, from meditated harm; thus the kitchen, the laundry, the smokehouse, and the dairy are within its protection, for each contributes in its way to the comfort and convenience of the place as a mansion or dwelling." State v. Langford, 12 N. C. 253.

Entry at night.

Burglary is the breaking and entering of a dwelling house in the nighttime with intent to commit a felony therein. State v. McCall, 4 Ala. 643, 644, 39 Am. Dec. 314; State v. Potts, 75 N. C. 129, 130; State v. Foster, 40 S. E. 209, 210, 129 N. C. 704;

State v. Willis, 52 N. C. 190 (quoting Arch. Cr. Pl. 251); State v. Ginns (S. C.) 1 Nott & McC. 583, 584 (citing 4 Bl. Comm. 224); State v. Wilson, 1 N. J. Law (Coxe) 439, 440, 1 Am. Dec. 216; Connors v. State, 45 N. J. Law (16 Vroom) 340, 342; State v. McCall, 4 Ala. 643, 644, 39 Am. Dec. 314; Cole v. People, 37 Mich. 544, 548; Ducher v. State, 18 Ohio, 308, 316; State v. Kane, 23 N. W. 488, 489, 63 Wis. 260; Kyle v. Commonwealth, 63 S. W. 782, 111 Ky. 404; People v. Stapleton, 3 Pac. 6, 9, 2 Idaho (Hasb.) 47; State v. Gray, 48 Pac. 801, 23 Nev. 301; People v. Arnold (N. Y.) 6 Parker, Cr. R. 638, 640; In re Lagrave (N. Y.) 45 How. Prac. 301, 302.

Burglary is the forcible breaking and entering of any house or any tent in the nighttime with the intent to commit murder, rape, mayhem, larceny, or other felony. Rev. Laws 332, § 59; People v. Stapleton, 3 Pac. 6, 9, 2 Idaho (Hasb.) 47.

"Burglary" is defined by Cr. Law Code, § 48, as follows: "If any person shall in the night season willfully, maliciously and forcibly break and enter into any dwelling house etc., with intent to kill, rob or commit a felony every person so defined shall be guilty of burglary." Under such definition it is an essential element of the crime that it be committed in the nighttime, and the defendant cannot be convicted of burglary by a proof that the breaking and entering was in the daytime. In re McVey, 70 N. W. 51, 52, 50 Neb. 481.

"Burglary" is defined by Cr. Code, § 36, without regard to whether the act is committed in the day or in the night time, but prescribes a heavier punishment for the latter. A conviction, therefore, may be had on an indictment for burglarizing a dwelling house which does not state whether committed in the day or night time, where the evidence shows it to have been committed in the night, the time of the commission of the act being under the statute but an aggravation of the offense. Schwabacher v. People, 46 N. E. 809, 811, 165 Ill. 618.

Entry in daytime.

Burglary in some states, by some statutes, may be committed in the daytime, as well as at night. Thus, under Rev. St. 365, § 70, burglary in the day is defined as "any breaking and entering of a dwelling or other house with intent to commit murder, rape, robbery or any other felony in the daytime." Territory v. Duncan, 6 Pac. 353, 5 Mont. 478.

If a door be shut and simply held in position by its own pressure upon the side and facing, it is a sufficient force and breaking to constitute a daytime "burglary" to push, pull, or shove it open with burglarious intent. Duke v. State, 57 S. W. 652, 653, 42 Tex. Cr. R. 3.

Burglary is the entering of a house by force, threats, or fraud at night, or in like manner by entering a house during the day and remaining therein concealed until night, and with the intent in either case to commit a felony, or the crime of theft. He is also guilty of burglary who, with intent to commit a felony or a theft, is guilty of breaking or entering a house in the daytime. Hammons v. State, 16 S. W. 99, 29 Tex. App. 445.

Entry of church.

Burglary, at common law, is an offense against the habitation of man. It may also be stated that the crime of burglary, even at common law, extends to the felonious breaking and entering a church. People v. Richards, 108 N. Y. 137, 142, 15 N. E. 371, 372, 2 Am. St. Rep. 373.

Entry of master's chamber.

It will amount to burglary if a servant in the nighttime open the chamber door of his master or mistress, whether latched or otherwise fastened, and enter for the purpose of committing murder or rape, or for any other felonious design. Hence, where a servant who has a right to sleep in his master's dwelling goes in, not with intent to lodge, but with intent to steal by opening the door or raising the sash, and actually steals and carries away his master's goods, he commits a burglary. State v. Howard, 42 S. E. 173, 175, 64 S. C. 344, 58 L. R. A. 685, 92 Am. St. Rep. 804.

Entry of shop.

By statute the crime of burglary may be committed by breaking open a shop wherein goods, wares, and merchandise are deposited. State v. Carrier (Conn.) 5 Day, 131, 133.

Entry of warehouse or granary.

A building placed on a market garden, and used for storing tools and implements, and such seeds as were sown there, is not a warehouse nor a granary within the meaning of the Constitution punishing the offense of stealing in a warehouse or granary. State v. Wilson, 47 N. H. 101, 104.

Felonious intent.

To constitute burglary, there must be a breaking and entry with a felonious intent, and it is immaterial whether the intention to commit a felony is actually carried out, or only demonstrated by the attempt. Wilburn v. State, 41 Tex. 237, 239.

The offense of burglary consists of breaking and entering with intent to steal or commit any felony, and the commission of the crime of which the intent is charged is not the only evidence by which such intent may be proved. It may be shown by some other fact or circumstance, or by some act or declaration of the accused. People v. Marks (N. Y.) 4 Parker, Cr. R. 153, 156.

"Burglary" is defined by Burns' Ann. St. 1894, as the "breaking and entering in the nighttime into any . . . barn . . . with intent to commit a felony." The breaking and entry must be done with the felonious intent. Barnhart v. State, 154 Ind. 177, 178, 56 N. E. 212, 213.

The breaking into and entering a dwelling house in the nighttime is not burglary unless it be done with intent to commit a felony. The breaking and entering a dwelling house, therefore, with an intent to cut off an ear of an inhabitant, is not a burglary, since the act of cutting off an ear is not a felony. Commonwealth v. Newell, 7 Mass. 245, 247.

"The offense is not complete without the felonious intent, and breaking and entering without this is only trespass." State v. Meche, 7 South. 573, 574, 42 La. Ann. 273 (citing Abb. Law Dict.).

In some of the states the entry by any person of any house, room, or store with intent to commit a larceny is declared to be burglary, but the intent with which the entry is made is a necessary element to constitute the crime. People v. Phelan, 28 Pac. 855, 93 Cal. 111.

In order to constitute burglary, the intent to steal or commit a felony must have existed at the time of the breaking and entering. If this intent was not formed in the mind of the offender until after the breaking and entering were complete, there was no burglary. A charge by which defendant attempted to have this principle presented instructed that the intent to steal must have existed "before and not after" the defendant entered the house. This instruction was calculated to lead the jury to believe that although the intent to steal may have existed at the time of the breaking and entering, yet if it did not exist after the house was entered, there would be no burglary. Nor is it essential to the crime of burglary that the intent spoken of shall exist before the breaking. It must be concurrent with the breaking and entering, and may be formed at the moment of time the breaking occurs. Jackson v. State, 15 South. 344, 345, 102 Ala. 167.

Force.

Burglary consists of an entry which, if made at night, must be by force, threats, or fraud; hence an entry through doors which were left open at night when the occupants of the house retired was not a sufficient entry by force to constitute burglary. Williams v. State (Tex.) 13 S. W. 609.

Burglary consists in violating the common security of a dwelling house in the nighttime for the purpose of committing a felony. It makes no difference whether the doors are barred and bolted, or the windows secured, or not. It is enough that the house is secured in the ordinary way. Commonwealth v. Stephenson, 25 Mass. (8 Pick.) 354, 355.

Larceny distinguished.

See "Larceny."

Occupancy of place entered.

It is sufficient to constitute burglary that the building broken into be a dwelling house or mansion, whether any person be there at the time of the burglary or not. 2 East (Eng. Ed. 1803) 496, c. 15, § 11. It is agreed by all that a house where a man dwells for the part of the year, or a chamber in one of the inns of a court, or of a college wherein any person usually dwells, may be called his "dwelling house," whether any person was actually therein or not at the very time of the offense. Yet in all cases the owner must have quitted the house animo revertendi in order to have it still considered as his mansion when neither he nor any part of his family were in it at the time of the breaking and entering. People v. Vangaasbeck (N. Y.) 9 Abb. Prac. (N. S.) 328, 345 (quoting 1 Hale, P. C. 556).

BURGLARY IN THE FIRST DEGREE.

Burglary in the first degree is a breaking into or entering in the nighttime the dwelling house of another, in which there shall be at the time some human being, with intent to commit some felony therein, either by forcibly bursting or breaking the wall, or any outer door, window, or shutter of such house, or the lock or bolt of such door, or the fastening of such window or shutter, or by breaking in, in any other manner, while armed with some dangerous weapon, or with the assistance and aid of one or more confederates, men actually present aiding and assisting by unlocking an outer door by means of false keys, or by picking the lock thereof. State v. Cash, 16 Pac. 144, 145, 38 Kan. 50.

BURGLARY IN THE THIRD DEGREE.

"A person who either: First, with intent to commit a crime therein, breaks and enters a building, or a room, or any part of a building * * * is guilty of burglary in the third degree." Pen. Code, § 498. People v. Bosworth, 19 N. Y. Supp. 114, 116, 64 Hun, 72.

Laws 1863, c. 244, defining "burglary in the third degree" as entering a building or room or any part of a building with intent to commit crime, does not embrace the entering of a burial vault or a building erected solely for the interment of the dead. People v. Richards, 13 N. Y. St. Rep. 515, 519.

BURGURLY.

Where, on trial of accused for burglary and larceny, the jury found accused guilty of "burgurly," the word so used was sufficiently idem sonans to justify a sentence and judgment for burglary. State v. Smith, 29 South. 20, 21, 104 La. 464.

BURIAL PLACE.

See, also, "Burying Grounds"; "Cemetery."

By reasonable implication the words "cemetery" and "burial place" include both public and private cemeteries and burial places, and an indictment that a person removed certain gates from the fence of a cemetery or burial place reasonably implies that they were removed from a public or private cemetery or burial place, and hence the indictment is sufficient to charge a violation of Rev. St. 1894, § 2041 (Rev. St. 1881, § 1962), prohibiting the removal of any fence or other work in or around any "public or private cemetery or burial place," under penalty of fine. Lay v. State, 39 N. E. 768, 769, 12 Ind. App. 362.

Where a religious corporation conveyed to individual members lots in their burial ground, the deed running to the party of the second part, his heirs and assigns, forever, to be used for the purpose of a "burial place" only, such language meant that there was a grant of the use of the lots as a place of burial, in subordination to the right of the corporation in the soil or freehold, and that the trustees had a right to sell the property and remove the remains of the dead. In re Reformed Presbyterian Church of City of New York (N. Y.) 7 How. Prac. 476-478.

The term "place of burial" means a place dedicated and set apart for the burial of the dead, and is not limited to the narrower import of tenanted graves, spots of ground actually occupied by buried corpses, but is to be interpreted according to the known habits and usages of the people to congregate their dead in places set apart for that sacred purpose. A cemetery set apart and used for burying the dead is a "place of burial" within Const. art. 207, exempting places of burial from taxation unless leased and used for purposes of private or corporate profit or income. Metairie Cemetery Ass'n v. Board of Assessors, 37 La. Ann. 32, 35.

BURLAPS.

Tariff Act Oct. 1, 1890, par. 364, relating to burlaps not exceeding 60 inches in width, does not include articles woven of flax, and of jute and flax, less than 60 inches in width, used chiefly in the manufacture of clothing, for the particular purposes of stiffening collars and fronts of coats and other garments, the goods being known commercially as "canvas," "paddings," "ducks," "coatings," etc. White v. United States (U. S.) 65 Fed. 788, 790.

BURN.

In an indictment charging that the accused did burn a house, the word "burn" implies that the house was consumed. "To burn" has for its first and leading meaning in Webster's Dictionary "to consume with fire," and such is its meaning as commonly used. Hester v. State, 17 Ga. 130, 132.

A charge that another "burned his own store" is not libelous per se, as simply to burn one's own store is not unlawful; but it must be made to appear by colloquium or averment, in order to render the word slanderous, that defendant charged the plaintiff with having willfully and maliciously burned his own store. Bloss v. Tobey, 19 Mass. (2 Pick.) 320, 325.

A charge that another "burned his property" is not per se slanderous, as the language does not import that the burning was unlawful, or that it was not innocently done. Tebbetts v. Goding, 75 Mass. (9 Gray) 254.

A count in a declaration for slander alleged that B., the plaintiff, owned a certain building and the goods therein; that the building and goods were insured and burned; and that, after the burning, the defendant, "speaking with reference thereto," and knowing of the insurance, accused the plaintiff of the crime of willfully burning the building and goods with intent to injure the insurers, by words spoken of the plaintiff substantially as follows: "B. burned the store." Another count alleged that the plaintiff petitioned to be and was adjudged a bankrupt, and that the defendant accused the plaintiff of the crime of disposing, otherwise than in bona fide transactions, within three months before his petition, and for the purpose of defrauding his creditors, of goods bought by him and unpaid for, attempting to account for them by fictitious losses, and doing acts in violation of the bankrupt act, by words spoken of the plaintiff during the pendency of the bankruptcy proceedings, substantially as follows: "B. burned the store;" "the defendant thereby referring" to the burning "referred to in the preceding count," whereby certain accounts and papers relating to the plaintiff's business were destroyed. Held, that both counts were bad, because they did not sufficiently show that any crime was imputed to the plaintiff by the words spoken. Brettun v. Anthony, 103 Mass. 37, 39.

A charge that another "burned his mill" is actionable as importing a crime, when used in connection with other language showing that it was intended to charge that the mill was burned to defraud insurers. Chace v. Sherman, 119 Mass. 387, 391.

As blacken, scorch, or char.

To "burn" means to consume by fire, and in a case of arson, if the wood is blackened, but no fibers are wasted, there is no burning, yet the wood need not be in a blaze, and the burning of any part, however small, is sufficient to constitute the offense, and, if the house is charred in a single place so as to destroy any of the fibers of the wood, it is sufficient to constitute arson. People v. Haggerty, 46 Cal. 354, 355.

Evidence that the floor near the hearth was scorched—charred in a trifling way—was a sufficient burning to support an indictment for arson. Regina v. Parker, 9 Car. & P. 45.

"Burning," in the definition of "arson" as the burning, etc., of a house, means "the burning of any, the smallest, part of a house, and it is burned within the common-law definition of the offense when it is charred—that is, when reduced to coal and its identity changed—not when merely scorched or discolored by heat." State v. Hall, 93 N. C. 571, 573.

In an indictment for arson, "burn" does not refer to an entire consumption, but any charring of wood by fire is a sufficient burning to come within the statute charging burning. Benbow v. State, 29 South. 553, 554, 128 Ala. 1.

Where a wooden partition in a building, and annexed to it, was charred and in one place burned through, it was a sufficient burning to constitute arson. People v. Simpson, 50 Cal. 304, 306.

As consume in part.

The burning of a dwelling house is supported by proof that some portion of the house was actually on fire, so that the substance of the wood of such portion was actually burned, although it was not consumed, and the substance and fiber of the wood was not actually destroyed. Commonwealth v. Tucker, 110 Mass. 403, 404.

"Burning," as used in St. 1804, c. 131, § 1, providing that if any person shall, by the burning of a building adjoining a dwelling house, burn such dwelling house in the night-time, he shall be guilty of arson, mean "burning" as understood at common law; that is, that if any part of the dwelling house, however small, be consumed by the fire, the offense is complete. Commonwealth v. Van Schaack, 16 Mass. 105.

"The burning necessary to constitute arson of a house at common law must be actual burning of the whole or some part of the house. Neither a bare intention, nor even an attempt to burn a house by actually setting fire to it, will amount to the offense if no part of it be burned; but it is not necessary that any part of the house should be wholly consumed, or that the fire should have any continuance, and the offense will be complete though the fire be put out or go out by itself." Mary v. State, 24 Ark. 44, 45, 81 Am. Dec. 60.

In the case of The Glenlivet [1894] Prob. Div. 48, in holding that the question whether a vessel injured by fire was a "burned vessel" within the meaning of the term in a marine policy, Lord Justice Smith said: "Suppose the cabin curtains were burned, the trial court should have told the jury that that did not constitute a burned ship. But suppose the after part of the ship was burned altogether, and the fore part was not burned at all, I think he should have told them that they might, if they liked, find that that was a burned ship, although there was only a partial burning. It seems to me impossible to lay down absolutely, in the affirmative or the negative, as to whether a partial burning does constitute a burned ship or not within the policy. It may or may not, according to the actual facts appertaining to the partial burning." The London Assurance v. Companhia d' Moagens do Barreiro, 17 Sup. Ct. 785, 788, 167 U. S. 149, 42 L. Ed. 113.

The setting fire to and burning a part of a jail with a view of enabling a prisoner to escape is within a statute punishing the burning of jails, where the person intended to burn the building in order to effect his main design; but if he burned a part merely for the purpose of effecting his escape, and not with the intent of destroying the building, he is not guilty of burning the jail. State v. Mitchell, 27 N. C. 350, 353.

As set on fire.

In 1 N. R. L. 407, 36th Sess. ch. 29, imposing the death penalty for the willful burning of any inhabited dwelling, "burning" means the setting of a fire to an inhabited dwelling with criminal intent, and it is not necessary that the building should have been burned or entirely consumed in order to bring a case within the statute. People v. Butler (N. Y.) 16 Johns. 203, 204.

The word "burning," as used in the definition of arson to the effect that it is the burning of any house, does not require that the house be consumed, it being sufficient to show that a person has set fire to the house to the extent that some part of the house was on fire, unless it is made clearly to appear that it was accidental, or done for some object wholly different from the intention to burn up or consume the house. Smith v.

1 Wds. & P.—58

State, 5 S. W. 219, 220, 23 Tex. App. 357, 59 Am. Rep. 773.

As to what constitutes a "burning" within the meaning of the word in the definition of arson, a bare attempt, or attempt to do it by actually setting fire to a house, unless it actually burns, does not fall within the definition. People v. Myers, 20 Cal. 76, 78.

To constitute a "burning," within the meaning of the chapter relating to arson, it is not necessary that the building set on fire should have been destroyed. It is sufficient that fire is applied so as to take effect upon any part of the substance of the building. Pen. Code Cal. 1903, § 451; Pen. Code Idaho 1901, § 4925; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 7386; Pen. Code S. D. 1903, § 546; Rev. St. Utah 1898, § 4330.

"Burning," within the meaning of that part of the Penal Code defining and punishing arson, does not imply that the building set on fire should be destroyed. It is sufficient if the fire is applied so as to take effect upon the substance of the building. Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 2414.

BURNING.

"Burning," as used in the statute of frauds specifying burning as one method of revoking a will, means more than the singeing of the cover of the will. The act required must be palpable and visible, the intention seeming to be to prevent inferences drawn from slight circumstances. Reed v. Harris, 6 Adol. & El. 209, 8 Adol. & El. 1.

The term "burning," in the statute of wills of 1833, authorizing the revocation of wills by burning, does not mean entire consumption by fire. Appeal of Evans, 58 Pa. 238-242 (citing Bibb v. Thomas, 2 Wm. Bl. 1043; Reed v. Harris, 6 Adol. & El. 209).

BURNING FLUID.

"Burning fluid," as used in an insurance policy which provided that the same shall be void if any "camphene, spirit-gas, burning fluid" or chemical oils shall be kept on the premises, means fluids of the nature of those enumerated, or equally dangerous. Wheeler v. American Cent. Ins. Co., 6 Mo. 235, 240.

Mixture of camphene and alcohol.

A fire insurance policy prohibiting the storing or use of camphene, spirit gas, or any "burning fluid" on the premises insured should not be construed to refer to the products of rock or mineral oil, such as naphtha, kerosene, etc., but to burning fluid which is a mixture of camphene and alcohol. Putman v. Commonwealth Ins. Co. (U. S.) 4 Fed. 753, 764.

"Burning fluid or chemical oils," in an insurance policy providing that if the assured shall keep or use any camphene or spirit gas, or "burning fluid, or chemical oils," on the premises covered by the policy, it should be void, means only such burning fluids and chemicals as are in their nature like camphene or spirit gas. Mears v. Humboldt Ins. Co., 92 Pa. 15, 19, 37 Am. Rep. 647.

Burning fluid is said to be a highly explosive and very dangerous illuminative liquid, a mixture of camphene and alcohol. Bennett v. North British & Mercantile Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 8 Daly, 471, 473.

Kerosene.

"Burning fluid," as used in an insurance policy forbidding the insured to use any camphene, spirit gas, or any "burning fluid" or chemical oil on the premises, cannot mean every fluid that will burn, and does not include kerosene. Mark v. National Fire Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 24 Hun, 565, 569.

BURNT STARCH.

The ordinary meaning of the words "burnt starch" is starch which has been burned, but the word in a tariff act fixing a duty on burnt starch is to receive the meaning given in ordinary commercial operations, unless a trade meaning different from that in ordinary use is established by a preponderance of the evidence, which is to be determined by the jury. In a case at bar the jury found that glucose and grape sugar were not dutiable as "burnt starch." Weilbacher v. Merritt (U. S.) 37 Fed. 85, 87.

BURSTING.

A policy providing that the company should not be liable for any loss arising from "the bursting of boilers" includes any loss of which the bursting of boilers was the approximate cause, as where the boilers burst and the ship took fire therefrom and was burned up. "Contracts are to be construed according to the intention of the parties, and hence, although the burning of the boat or any injury by fire does not always or often attend the bursting of its boilers, yet it is a general opinion that such is sometimes the result, or, at least, that fire might sometimes be the necessary and inevitable consequence of the bursting of the boilers. The parties must be held to have understood that a loss so happening would be a loss arising from the bursting of boilers, so that the insured could not have expected the company to be liable for such loss when it was expressly agreed that they were not liable for any loss arising from the bursting of boilers." Montgomery v. Firemen's Ins. Co., 55 Ky. (16 B. Mon.) 427, 442.

The term "bursting of boilers," as used in an insurance policy against any loss occasioned by fire except when caused by explosion of boiler, and except as limited by warranties therein, such as "bursting of boilers," means a breaking of the boiler from explosion, they being one and the same thing; but it does not include the collapsing of a flue, a flue being inside of and forming part of the boiler, if a flue boiler, but is not the boiler proper, and may collapse, leaving the boiler proper intact. The "collapsing" of a flue means a falling together suddenly, while an "explosion" means a sudden bursting from internal or other force. Louisville Underwriters v. Durland, 24 N. E. 221, 222, 123 Ind. 544, 7 L. R. A. 399.

BURTHEN.

See "Burden."

BURYING GROUNDS.

See "Free Burying Ground."
See, also, "Burial Place"; "Cemetery."

Where 40 acres of land were deeded to a church to be used as a burying ground, and only 1 acre of which had been adopted to such use, the balance of the tract was not exempt from taxation as church property used as burying ground. Mulroy v. Churchman, 3 N. W. 72, 73, 52 Iowa, 238.

"Burying grounds," as used in Act 1876, c. 216, which exempts from taxation graveyards, cemeteries, and burying grounds set apart for the use of any family or belonging to any church or congregation, means any ground devoted to burial purposes which is not used for any other object. The fact that a part only of the lot or piece of ground is occupied by graves does not confine the exemption to the spots of ground so appropriated. Appeal Tax Court of Baltimore City v. St. Peter's Academy, 50 Md. 321, 353.

BUSHEL.

See "Half Bushel."

The Vermont Statute of 1824, providing that the standard of weight of corn shall be 56 pounds to the bushel, meant that 56 pounds of corn, whether measuring more or less than the Winchester bushel, should be equivalent to a bushel. Richardson v. Spafford, 13 Vt. 245, 247.

"Bushels," as used in a contract for the sale of 1,000 "bushels" of good merchantable wheat at a certain price per bushel, should be construed to mean weight simply, and does not refer to the general meaning affixed to the term "bushel" as a mere measure of capacity. Milk v. Christie (N. Y.) 1 Hill, 102, 106.

"Bushel," taken by itself, and without reference to any custom or agreement, meant a statute bushel. Hockin v. Cooke, 4 Term R. 314, 316.

BUSHWHACKER.

The term "bushwhacker," as an old English word, would not of itself import anything of a criminal nature; much less would it imply any particular indictable offense known to our law. But of late the word has come to have a special application and a particular signification in popular use. It has found its way into the Constitution of the estate, where it seems to have been used as equivalent to "that description of marauding commonly known as bushwhacking." In the modern sense of the word as now sometimes used in common speech, it seems to be applied to a class of persons who are not a part of any regular army, and are not answerable to any military discipline, but who are mere lawless banditti, engaged in plundering, robbing, murder, and all conceivable crimes. Curry v. Collins, 37 Mo. 324, 328.

All other business, see "All Other."

Manufacturing business, see "Manufacture."

Other business, see "Other."

The word "business" is defined by Webster as that which occupies the time, attention, or labor of men for the purpose of profit or improvement. Trustees of Columbia College v. Lynch (N. Y.) 47 How. Prac. 273, 275.

Business "is that which busies or occupies the time, attention, or labor of one as his principal concern, whether for a longer or shorter time; employment; occupation; any particular occupation or employment; mercantile transactions in general; concern; right or occasion of making one's self busy; affairs; transaction. As used in Comp. St. § 1356, requiring every person who shall carry on any gift, lottery, or prize distribution 'business,' to pay a license fee, it means any concern or scheme by which a gift, lottery, or prize distribution is made, without reference to the purpose for which it is made." Territory v. Harris, 19 Pac. 286, 287, 8 Mont. 140.

"Business" is defined as that which engages the time, attention, or labor of any one as his principal concern or interest, whether for a longer or shorter time; constant employment; regular occupation. So, under Code, § 3190, declaring that no contract of a minor can be disaffirmed where, by reason of the minor's having engaged in business as an adult, the other party had good reason to believe him capable of contracting, it is held that the term "engaging in business" should be construed as signifying an employment or occupation which occupied the minor's time for the purpose of a livelihood or profit; and hence evidence that a minor was employed as a farm laborer at a stipulated price per year, and while so engaged he purchased certain lots, was insufficient to show that he was engaged in business so as to preclude him from rescinding such purchase. Beickler v. Guenther (Iowa) 96 N. W. 895, 896.

The term "business consumption," as used in Laws 1897, p. 165, c. 378, § 475, giving the commissioner of water supply in New York discretion to cause water meters to be placed in places in which water is furnished for business consumption, does not confer on the commissioner authority to install meters in premises other than those wholly or partly subjected to use in some regular calling or vocation. It is certainly an unreasonable view that the Legislature had in mind at the time isolated instances of water supplied, even for some return, to an adjoining house, in a spirit of neighborly accommodation. Popularly, and therefore apparently, a supply of water under such conditions is not to be regarded as "business." Foster v. Monroe, 82 N. Y. Supp. 653, 654, 40 Misc. Rep. 449.

Under a charter of a city conferring power on it to require all persons, companies, and corporations engaged in any business or vocation within its limits to take out a license and pay a reasonable tax or charge therefor, the word "business" is not to be limited so as to render only such persons liable as transact the whole of their business within the city, but will include those who do only a portion of their business in the city. Thus a railroad company, though engaged in a business of a similar character outside the city limits, but which has an agent regularly employed to attend to its business in the city, is subject to said license tax. Florida Cent. & P. R. Co. v. City of Columbia, 32 S. E. 408, 413, 54 S. C. 266.

The word "business," as used in Act Feb. 27, 1855, providing that all persons and associations doing business in the state of New York as merchants, bankers, or otherwise, and not residents of the state, shall be assessed and taxed, embraces everything about which a person can be employed. People v. Commissioners of Taxes of New York (N. Y.) 22 How. Prac. 143, 147.

"Business," within the rule that every man owes to every other the duty of due care to avoid injury, and, whether he manages his business in person or intrusts it to another, he must at his peril see that this obligation is observed, is not restricted as meaning business in an ordinary sense, but embraces everything the servant may do for the master with his express or implied sanction. It is immaterial to the master's responsibility that the servant at the time was neglecting some rule of caution which the master prescribed, or was exceeding his master's instructions, or was disregarding them in some particular, and that the injury which actually resulted is attributable to the servant's failure to observe the directions given him. International & G. N. R. Co. v. Cooper (Tex.) 30 S. W. 470, 472.

Testator was engaged in carrying on a large mercantile business, and had a large amount of debts due him. He appointed his sons-in-law and widow as executors, and instructed them to sell out the stock of goods on hand on specified terms, taking good security for the purchase money, and by a subsequent clause directed an inventory to be taken of all debts due him, as well as of all debts owing by him, and a copy of this inventory to be furnished to each of the executors, adding, "W. [one of the executors] is hereby charged with the winding up of the business, and after paying all the debts I owe, then the money, as fast as it is collected, to the amount of $500 must be deposited in bank," and further providing that his acts should always be open to the inspection of the other executors, and, if he did not act justly in the collections, he should be dismissed and another one of the executors take his place, and directed the executors to employ a competent person "to assist him in winding up the business." Held, that the word "business" meant only the collection of the outstanding debts growing out of the testator's mercantile business. Hollingsworth v. Hollingsworth's Ex'rs, 65 Ala. 321, 329.

Within the meaning of an act fixing a tax on all agents of packing houses doing business within this state, the word "business" refers to the business of the agent, and not that of the principal, for it is the agent, and not the principal, who shall pay the tax at the time of commencing to do business. Stewart v. Kehrer, 41 S. E. 680, 681, 115 Ga. 184.

"Trade or business," as used in Code 1871, § 1780, providing that all contracts made by the husband or wife, or either of them, for supplies for the plantation of the wife, may be enforced against her separate estate, and that when a married woman "engages in trade or business as a feme sole" she shall be bound by her contracts made "in the course of such trade or business" in the same manner as if she were unmarried, means "a trade or business other than that specifically mentioned and regulated by the statute, and the contracts arising out of such trade or business were intended to be different from those which she was authorized to make in her capacity as a feme covert." Duncan v. Robertson, 58 Miss. 390, 396.

Limited to ejusdem generis.

"Business," as used in Act April 9, 1872, giving priority to wages for labor and services rendered by any miner, mechanic, laborer, or clerk employed by persons engaged in the operation of any works, mines, manufacturing, or "business," means other business of the same general character as that specifically mentioned. Reichard v. Duryer (Pa.) 10 Wkly. Notes Cas. 189.

Laws 1876, c. 122, forbidding the employment of children for any immoral purpose, exhibition, or practice, or in any "business, exhibition or vocation" injurious to the health or dangerous to the life or limb, means an employment either vicious in itself or one partaking of the character of an amusement, and would not include any productive industries or necessary occupations. Hickey v. Taaffe, 1 N. E. 685, 686, 99 N. Y. 204, 52 Am. Rep. 19.

Abstracting.

Abstracting is a "business" within Civ. Code, § 1674, providing that one who sells the good will of a business may agree with the buyer to refrain from carrying on a similar business. Ragsdale v. Nagle, 39 Pac. 628, 630, 106 Cal. 332.

As action.

"Business" is a word of large signification, denoting employment or occupation in which a person is engaged to procure a living. "Business" and "employment" are synonymous terms, signifying that which occupies the time, attention, and labor of men for purposes of a livelihood or for profit. Anderson's Law Dict. The definitions contained in other dictionaries and various lexicons are substantially the same. The word "business," as used in Const. art. 8, § 5, providing that all civil and criminal business in the county must be tried in such county, is not synonymous with the word "action," and is not an element either of a cause or right of action, and is meaningless in the connection in which it is used in the Constitution, and the clause can be made intelligible only by substituting in its place "causes of action." White v. Rio Grande W. Ry. Co., 71 Pac. 593, 594, 25 Utah, 346. The word "business" as so used should be limited to business pending before the court, so that it applies only to actions and other proceedings actually brought. Gibbs v. Gibbs, 73 Pac. 641, 642, 26 Utah, 382. See, however, Konold v. Ry. Co., 16 Utah, 151, 51 Pac. 256 (cited and approved in Bach v. Brown, 53 Pac. 991, 992, 17 Utah, 435), wherein it was said that the word "business," as used in the same constitutional provision, was used as a general term to include causes of action and all other business which might arise in any county, and the manifest intention was that all suits, civil and criminal, should be brought and the cases tried in the county in which the action arose.

Acting as agent.

A contract providing that the defendant should not do any "express business" over any other road running to a place on the line of the plaintiff's business means that the defendant should no longer carry on the express business on his own account, and that he should not engage in the business for profit, but does not prevent the defendant from entering into the service of another who is doing an express business over a road running to a place on the line of plaintiff's business. Eastern Exp. Co. v. Meserve, 60 N. H. 198.

"Business," as used in a contract in which the defendant sold to the plaintiff all his stock in trade and his rights, interests, and privileges acquired in selling a certain kind of tobacco on a certain described route, and providing that the defendant should not hinder or obstruct the plaintiff in the prosecution of the business on such described route, means that the defendant shall not prosecute the business of selling tobacco on the same route, or in the vicinity thereof, and selling tobacco as the agent of another on such route constituted a violation of the agreement, since the defendant did not have the right to interfere in the prosecution of the business he had transferred, either as principal or agent. Ewing v. Johnson (N. Y.) 34 How. Prac. 202, 205.

Acts under special authority.

Const. art. 4, § 22, subd. 10, forbidding the passage of local or special laws regulating county "business," applies only to the usual affairs of the county, the conduct of which engages the services of the officers, and does not refer to an act which can be done in a particular case under the authority of a special law, the principal purpose and object of which is the relocation of a county seat. Jackson County Com'rs v. State, 46 N. E. 908, 911, 147 Ind. 476.

The term "business," when applied to a public corporation, signifies the conduct of the usual affairs of the corporation, and the conduct of such affairs as commonly engage the attention of such corporation, and does not include the performance of an act which can be done only in a particular case and by the authority of a special law. Mount v. State, 90 Ind. 29, 31, 46 Am. Rep. 192.

Agriculture or farming.

"Business," as used in St. 1862, c. 198, § 1, requiring that a married woman doing business on her own separate account must file a certificate with the town clerk, etc., does not mean only business as a "trader" in the ordinary sense of the word, or of a manufacturer or boarding house keeper, or other similar business, but may include agriculture as well. Snow v. Sheldon, 126 Mass. 332, 334, 30 Am. Rep. 684.

In Mansf. Dig. §§ 4624, 4626, 4630, authorizing a married woman to carry on any business on her separate account, and providing that her earnings therefrom shall be her sole and separate property, the term "business" signifies employment—that which employs time, attention, and labor. It does not signify trade alone, and hence the carrying on, improving, and cultivating of a farm is within the statute. Hickey v. Thompson, 12 S. W. 475, 476, 52 Ark. 234.

"Business" is defined to be "that which busies or occupies one's time, attention, and labor as his chief concern; that which one does for a livelihood; occupation; employment; as, his business was that of a merchant; to carry on the business of agriculture" (Cent. Dict.). Hence a lot used by a gardener for the cultivation of produce, and separated from his dwelling by streets, is exempt as a homestead under Const. 1876, art. 16, § 51, declaring that the homestead in a city shall consist of a lot or lots not to exceed a certain value, used for the purposes of a home "or as a place to exercise the calling or business of the head of a family." Waggner v. Haskell, 35 S. W. 1. 2, 89 Tex. 435.

Bringing or maintaining suit.

In a statute prohibiting a foreign corporation from doing business in the state without having first appointed a resident attorney on whom service of process may be made (Laws Or. 617, Act Oct. 24, 1864), as applied to a foreign life insurance company "business" means a doing of a life insurance business, and did not include the bringing or maintaining of a suit by such foreign company in a federal court located in the state. Northwestern Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Elliott (U. S.) 5 Fed. 225, 231.

Conducting school.

Where the owner of an estate covered with houses sold some of them subject to a covenant not to carry on any "trade, business or calling" therein to the annoyance or injury of any of the houses on the estate, the carrying on of a girls' school was a violation of the covenant, being a "business" or "calling" within its meaning. Kemp v. Sober, 1 Sim. (N. S.) 517, 520.

As continuous business.

"Business," as used in Act Feb. 27, 1855, § 1, providing that all nonresidents doing business in the state should be taxed on all sums invested in any manner in business as though they were residents, means a continuous business, and property sent into the state for the purpose of sale without reinvestment of proceeds is not employed in "business" so as to be taxable. The court said "the word 'business' embraces everything about which a person can be employed." People v. Commissioners of Taxes of City of New York, 23 N. Y. 242, 243.

As doing business.

In New York tax laws relating to the taxation of foreign corporations, and providing that every corporation, joint-stock company, etc., doing business in this state shall be subject to and pay a tax, as a tax upon its corporate franchise or "business," into the treasury of the state annually, to be computed as follows, etc., the word "business" refers back to the words "doing business in this state," as used in the same section, and means business done within the state. People v. Equitable Trust Co., 96 N. Y. 387, 388, 393.

Execution of instruments.

Where a statute prohibits the transaction of "business" by certain corporations, the taking of a note was the making of a contract, which signified the doing of business within the prohibition of the law. Hacheny v. Leary, 7 Pac. 329, 332, 12 Or. 40.

"Business," as used in Rev. St. c. 83, § 1, forbidding the exercise of any secular labor, business, or employment on Sunday, will be construed to include the execution of a note in carrying out a previous contract, when such act is not a work or necessity or charity. Lovejoy v. Whipple, 18 Vt. 379, 383, 46 Am. Dec. 157.

Under the Constitution prohibiting unnecessary labor on Sunday, the execution and delivery of a promissory note upon Sunday has been declared "business of a person's secular calling," and generally an act to the disturbance of others, and as such is prohibited under a penalty. State Capital Bank v. Thompson, 42 N. H. 369, 370 (citing Brackett v. Hoyt, 29 N. H. [9 Fost.] 264, 267).

The term "business," as used in the Revised Statutes, providing that no person shall do any manner of "labor, business or work" on Sunday, includes the execution of a bond. The Legislature intended to prohibit secular business, and did not confine the prohibition to manual labor, but extended it to the making of bargains and all kinds of trafficking. Pattee v. Greely, 54 Mass. (13 Metc.) 284, 286.

"Business," as used in Rev. St. 1878, § 4594, making it unlawful for any one to do any business on the first day of the week, is employed synonymously with "transaction," and hence, where a town board of supervisors were authorized to issue bonds in aid of a railroad upon the presentation of a petition signed by taxpayers, the affixing of a signature to such petition on Sunday was unlawful under section 4594. De Forth v. Wisconsin & M. R. Co., 9 N. W. 17, 19, 52 Wis. 320, 38 Am. Rep. 737.

Labor, "business," or work, within the meaning of the statute prohibiting any labor, business, or work, except works of necessity and charity, on the Lord's day, includes the giving of a promissory note on Sunday in consideration of articles purchased on that day. Towle v. Larrabee, 26 Me. (13 Shep.) 464, 466.

Good will.

A contract for the sale of all a person's right, title, and interest in a grocery business cannot be construed to mean only the good will of the business. The good will of a business is not the business, but it is one result springing out of it. McGowan v. Griffin, 37 Atl. 298, 299, 69 Vt. 168.

The expression "transfer of the business" is an uncertain, equivocal expression, and may mean property, or it may mean good will. Widdall v. Garsed, 17 Atl. 418, 419, 125 Pa. 358.

Hotel keeping.

Under a statute giving a lien for labor and services rendered in any works, mines, manufactory, or other business, the words "or other business" do not include a hotel. Appeal of Allen, *81 Pa. (32 P. F. Smith) 302, 304.

Housekeeping.

The word "business," as employed in the statute giving a debtor an exemption of $250 from the stock in trade of the business in which the debtor is wholly or principally engaged, does not mean housekeeping, and hence where a woman was a partner in a merchandising business, but principally engaged in keeping house for her husband, she was entitled to an exemption from the stock of the merchandising business. McCoy v. Brennan, 28 N. W. 129, 131, 61 Mich. 362, 1 Am. St. Rep. 589.

Issue of insurance policy.

The act of insuring a man's life in Washington territory by a Kansas company, the name, etc., of the man being sent into the home office by the soliciting agent of the company, and the policy thereupon issued there and sent out to Seattle, would not be doing "business," within the meaning of a statute of Washington territory prohibiting the doing of business by a foreign corporation which has not complied with the requirements of the law; but the subsequent accepting by such agent from the assured of a promissory note in payment of premium would be doing business, within such statute. To undertake to give an exact definition of the word "business" which could be applied as a test or criterion in every case would be impossible. It is said to be a word of large signification, and to denote the employment or occupation in which a person is engaged to procure a living. Goddard v. Chaffee, 84 Mass. (2 Allen) 395, 79 Am. Dec. 796; Martin v. State, 59 Ala. 34, 36. Under a statute providing that any person who shall do any manner of labor, business, etc., shall be punished, etc., the loaning of money and taking a note therefor was held to be "business," within the meaning of such statute. Troewert v. Decker, 51 Wis. 46, 8 N. W. 26, 37 Am. Rep. 808. In Bloom v. Richards, 2 Ohio St. 387, 388, the court, by Thurman, J., said: "That it seems to be the common expression of the courts that the making of a contract is 'business,' within the meaning of acts inhibiting doing business on a particular day. The taking of a note for a loan or debt, or other consideration, is the making of a contract, and is a transaction which signifies business. The transaction is in fact the doing of business." Hacheny v. Leary, 7 Pac. 329, 331, 12 Or. 40.

Keeping betting establishment.

The keeping of an establishment for the purpose of enabling persons to bet on horse races is not a useful or necessary occupation, and cannot be characterized as a "business," and a city may pass an ordinance punishing the same, though the person conducting such place may have received a license from the city to conduct a "business." Odell v. City of Atlanta, 25 S. E. 173, 174, 97 Ga. 670.

As lawful business.

"Trade or business," as used in Taylor, St. 1550, § 32, exempting from execution the stock in trade, etc., of any person used and kept for the purpose of carrying on his trade or business, means lawful trade or business, and hence does not apply to a person engaged in the sale of intoxicating liquors without a license. Walsch v. Call, 32 Wis. 159, 161.

Loaning money.

"Business," as used in Rev. St. § 4595, prohibiting the performance of any business on Sunday, would include such transactions as the loaning of money and a promise to repay. Troewert v. Decker, 8 N. W. 26, 51 Wis. 46, 37 Am. Rep. 808.

"Business," as used in Rev. St. 1898, § 4595, providing that any person who shall do any manner of labor or business or work on the Sabbath Day shall be punished, should be construed to include loaning money and taking a note therefor. The settlement of an old account for merchandise sold and the taking of a note therefor is business. Such acts by a person are business of his own. Howe v. Ballard, 89 N. W. 136, 137, 113 Wis. 375.

Making contract.

"Business or work of their ordinary callings," as used in Act 1741, c. 14, § 2, providing that all and every person shall on the Lord's Day, commonly called Sunday, carefully apply themselves to the duties of religion and piety, and shall not do any labor, business, or work of their ordinary callings, does not mean that all worldly labor shall be totally discontinued, but applies only to work and labor of one's ordinary calling, and does not extend to all kinds of labor indiscriminately, and therefore, where a person whose ordinary calling was that of a banker tried a horse on Sunday and entered into a contract to purchase it, the contract was not void as in contravention of the statute. Amis v. Kyle, 10 Tenn. (2 Yerg.) 31, 35, 24 Am. Dec. 463.

St. 29 Car. II, c. 7, § 5, providing that no tradesman, artificer, workman, or other person shall do worldly "labor, business or work of their ordinary calling" on Sunday, is limited only to labor, business, or work done in the course of a man's ordinary calling, and hence a contract of hiring men on Sunday between a farmer and a laborer was not within the statute. King v. Inhabitants of Whitnash, 7 Barn. & C. 596.

"Business," as used in statutes forbidding the exercise of business on Sunday, has commonly been construed to include the making of a contract. There is a distinction between labor and business, for though labor may be business it is not necessarily so, and the converse, that business is not always labor, is equally true. Where a statute merely prohibits labor on the Sabbath, it does not prohibit making a real contract, which is not labor, but business. Adams v. Hamell (Mich.) 2 Doug. 73, 43 Am. Dec. 455, was an exchange of horses. The court decided against the validity of the contract, saying that no case could be more clearly a matter of business within the statute. O'Donnell v. Sweeney, 5 Ala. 467, 470, 39 Am. Dec. 336, is directly in point, the court holding that the sale of the horses on Sunday was a matter of business, because it is a worldly business or employment, and falls within the letter as well as within the meaning of the statute. Bloom v. Richards, 2 Ohio St. 387, 399.

As money making occupation.

"Business," as used in the general incorporation statutes of Oregon, authorizing the formation of corporations for the purpose of engaging in any lawful enterprise, business, pursuit, or occupation, is not restricted in meaning to a scheme for making money, but includes any object that is consistent with the interest of society, and may engage the attention of men and invite their co-operation; and a corporation may lawfully be organized under such statute for the purpose of guarantying bonds of an educational institution to strengthen its credit. Maxwell v. Akin (U. S.) 89 Fed. 178, 180.

One may keep a billiard table or a ten-pin alley for the amusement of himself or his family without being engaged in keeping them as a "business." Eubanks v. State, 17 Ala. 181, 183.

As occupation for livelihood or profit.

"Business" is a word of large signification, and denotes the employment or occupation in which a person is engaged to procure a living. Goddard v. Chaffee, 84 Mass. (2 Allen) 395, 79 Am. Dec. 796.

"Business," as used in Civ. Code, § 2610, defining fellow servants as "servants about the same business," signifies the employment and occupation in which the person is engaged to procure a living. Brush Electric Light & Power Co. v. Wells, 35 S. E. 365, 367, 110 Ga. 192.

"The definition of 'business' by the lexicographers is sufficiently broad and comprehensive to embrace every employment or occupation, and all matters that engage a person's attention or require his care. The meaning of the legislatures as expressed in the statutes is not as extensive. 'Business,' in a legislative sense, is that which occupies the time, attention, and labor of men for purposes of livelihood or for profit; a calling for the purpose of a livelihood. It is used in the latter meaning in the statutes relating to license taxes." State v. Boston Club, 12 South. 895, 896, 45 La. Ann. 585, 20 L. R. A. 185; Moore v. State, 16 Ala. 411, 414.

Occupation of contractor.

Act May 12, 1891 (P. L. 54), making money due from any contractor for labor and services which accrued within six months preceding the sale or transfer of the real or personal property, business, or other property connected therewith in carrying on the same of the contractor on account of his death or insolvency, a lien on such property, should be construed to include the occupation of a contractor engaged in the erection of buildings and other work. His engagement in the erection or construction of buildings or works under contract constituted a "business," within the ordinary meaning of that word; that is, any employment or occupation in which a person is engaged to procure a living, embracing everything about which a man can be employed. Brown v. German-American Title & Trust Co., 34 Atl. 335, 343, 174 Pa. 443 (citing Goddard v. Chaffee, 84 Mass. [2 Allen] 395, 79 Am. Dec. 796; People v. Commissioner of Taxes of City of New York, 23 N. Y. 242, 244).

One or two acts as constituting.

In a contract by which a party agreed to not engage or be interested in the wood "business" so long as the other party was engaged in that business, the term is not used to denote an isolated act or two of disposing of wood for the special convenience and interest of the party, but a congregation of acts that may fairly constitute the carrying on of the wood business, defined in the contract as "buying and selling or furnishing wood." Parkhurst v. Brock, 47 Atl. 1068, 1069, 72 Vt. 355.

P. L. 1896, p. 307, § 97, requiring foreign corporations before transacting any business in the state to file with the Secretary of State a certain statement as to its capital stock, etc., and designating an office in the state, and an agent on whom process against it may be served, cannot be construed to mean a single sale of its product and the accepting a guaranty of payment in the state. In Hoagland v. Segur, 38 N. J. Law (9 Vroom) 230, 237, it was held that the term "business," with relation to the banking business, did not denote a single act of receiving deposits, but the aggregation of acts which fairly constituted the occupation of a banker; that it was a word frequently used as synonymous with "occupation," and signified more than the doing of acts which are usually done by persons engaged in the pursuit of a particular calling. Delaware & H. Canal Co. v. Mahlenbrock, 43 Atl. 978, 979, 63 N. J. Law, 281, 45 L. R. A. 538.

The term "business," as used in a statute forbidding the engaging in the business of hawking and peddling, is continuous in its character, not necessarily implying a single act or any number of acts, and is synonymous with the term "employment"; and that one who, without being engaged in a particular business, did a single act appertaining thereto, did not fall within its meaning. Sterne v. State, 20 Ala. 43, 46.

The term "business," as used in Rev. Code, § 3618, forbidding the engaging in the business of retailing spirituous liquors without a license, is a synonym of "employment," and signifies that which occupies the time, attention, and labor of a man for the purpose of gaining a livelihood or profit, and does not include a single sale of liquor. Martin v. State, 59 Ala. 34, 36.

One act of selling liquor without an intention of engaging in the business does not constitute engaging in or carrying on such business within the meaning of the statute, providing a penalty for being engaged in or carrying on the "business" of a retailer in spirituous liquors, etc. Bryant v. State, 46 Ala. 302, 303.

Under an act forbidding the doing of any worldly "business" on the Lord's Day, the offense consists in the exercise of the business, and may include one or more separate acts, so that each act done in one day in any worldly business does not constitute a distinct and separate offense. Friedeborn v. Commonwealth, 6 Atl. 160, 113 Pa. 242, 57 Am. Rep. 464.

Operation of stage.

The term "business," in a municipal charter authorizing a city to levy and collect a license tax on trades, professions, and business, includes the business of a stage company in receiving and discharging passengers within the municipal limits, although such passengers are carried either into or out of the municipality. City of Sacramento v. California Stage Co., 12 Cal. 134, 138.

Operation of street railway.

The operating of a street railway is a "business," within the statute requiring the payment of a license for carrying on a business. City of New Orleans v. New Orleans City & L. R. Co., 4 South. 512, 513, 40 La. Ann. 587.

As ordinary business.

An instruction, in an action for personal injuries, that in assessing the plaintiff's damages the jury should consider the permanent loss and damage arising from any disability resulting to the plaintiff from the injury, which renders him less capable of attending to his business than he would have been if the injury had not been received, refers to "his business" any business which the plaintiff might undertake to carry out, and there is no difference in meaning between the words "his business" and "his ordinary business." Treadwell v. Whittier, 22 Pac. 266, 267, 80 Cal. 574, 5 L. R. A. 498, 13 Am. St. Rep. 175.

"Business," as used in V. S. § 583, providing that every trust company or savings bank incorporated by the state and doing "business" therein shall pay a tax to the State Treasurer upon the average amount of its deposits, means the ordinary business of the corporation conducted by itself under its corporate powers, and an insolvent savings bank in the hands of a receiver for the purpose of liquidation is not doing "business" within the meaning of the statute. State v. Bradford Sav. Bank & Trust Co., 44 Atl. 349, 350, 71 Vt. 234.

As profits.

As used in a contract stating that A. & B. had formed a partnership, and that they employed C. as their treasurer, who was to receive in payment for his services "ten per cent. of the business," and that C. was to be allowed to furnish capital for the firm, the term "ten per cent. of the business" meant 10 per cent. on the profits, and not 10 per cent. on the whole amount of the business. Funck v. Haskell, 132 Mass. 580, 581.

As property.

See "Property."

As regular employment or established business.

In Pub. St. c. 11, § 20, cl. 1, providing that all goods, wares, and merchandise, and other stock in trade, including stock employed in the business of manufacturing in cities or towns within the commonwealth other than where the owner resides, shall be taxed in those places where the owners have or occupy stores, shops, or wharves, the word "business" refers to an established, and not a transient, "business," which shall have a local habitation in a town other than where the owner dwells. Ingram v. Cowles, 23 N. E. 48, 49, 150 Mass. 155.

The term "business" in common parlance means that employment which occupies the time, attention, and labor; that which a man occasionally engages in as opportunity offers or inclination prompts is for the time being his business; yet so far as the question where a person's usual place of business is at which notice of dishonor of negotiable paper may be given, the law uses the term "business" to indicate a regular and legal employment, not one that is occasional, irregular, or illegal. Stephenson v. Primrose (Ala.) 8 Port. 155, 167, 33 Am. Dec. 281.

The words "calling and business" used in the Constitution, authorizing the exemption of a man's place of business, are evidently used in a very broad sense. Taken together, they embrace every legitimate avocation in life in which an honest support for a family may be obtained. The latter word was probably used, in contradistinction to the other, to denote that which Mr. Webster defines to be the general meaning of the word—"that which occupies the time, attention, and labor of men for the purpose of profit or improvement," and this may be temporary. The calling may exist as a fact, whether it be practiced or not; with the other, the actual employment in the given occupation furnishes the only means to determine whether the business exists or not. Shryock v. Latimer, 57 Tex. 674, 677.

The keeping by a widow of a home for herself and her children at which she occasionally entertained for pay relatives of the family, while she neither had nor made any effort to get boarders other than members of the family, had none of the elements of an established business, within St. 1895, c. 488, § 14, providing for damages for persons owning an "established business" on lands taken for the Metropolitan Reservoir. Gavin v. Commonwealth, 65 N. E. 37, 182 Mass. 190.

As trade.

"Business," as used in a covenant in a deed prohibiting the grantee from carrying on or permitting any offensive or dangerous trade or "business" on the premises, will not be used in its comprehensive general sense, but will be limited when used in connection with the word "trade" (citing Wakefield v. Fargo, 90 N. Y. 213, 216; Hickey v. Taaffe, 99 N. Y. 204, 209, 1 N. E. 685, 52 Am. Rep. 19; Appeal of Pardee, 100 Pa. 408, 412), so that the covenant is not violated by the construction of a temporary railroad over which to carry soil excavated from other land. Bohn-sack v. McDonald, 56 N. Y. Supp. 347, 349, 26 Misc. Rep. 493.

In Laws 1892, c. 602, requiring any person intending to conduct the trade, business, or calling of a plumber, etc., to submit to examination before engaging in the business, etc., the words "trade, business, or calling" are synonymous, and have relation to the mechanical employments, one's trade, etc., being that business which he has learned and fitted himself to follow. People v. Warden of City Prison, 39 N. E. 686, 689, 144 N. Y. 529, 27 L. R. A. 718.

Gen. St. c. 133, § 32, exempting from execution the "tools, implements and fixtures necessary for carrying on trade or business," applies to such as mechanics, artisans, handicraftsmen, and others whose manual labor and skill afford means of earning their livelihood, and does not include those merely engaged in the business of buying and selling merchandise, not to exempt the weights and measures, horses and carriages, or other articles used by them in their trade, and so does not apply to one engaged in keeping a meat market and grocer's shop. Wallace v. Bartlett, 108 Mass. 52, 54.

Of banks of deposit.

The definition of the "business of banks of deposit" in the encyclopedias embraces the receiving of the money or valuables of others to keep until called for by the depositors. 1 Enc. Am. "Banks," 543; 1 Enc. Eng. "Arts and Sciences," 833, 837, 847. And although in modern times the business of receiving general deposits has constituted the principal business of banks, it cannot be said that the receiving of special deposits is so foreign to the banking business that corporations authorized to carry on that business are incapable of binding themselves by the receipt of such deposits. Pattison v. Syracuse Nat. Bank, 80 N. Y. 82, 95, 36 Am. Rep. 582.

Of common carrier.

A hotel owned by a railroad corporation, and kept by its lessees as a hotel and place of summer resort, is not included within the exemption from ordinary taxation enjoyed by the corporation in respect to such of its property as is held and used for the proper business of a common carrier. Hennepin County v. St. Paul, M. & M. Ry. Co., 44 N. W. 63, 64, 42 Minn. 238.

Of corporation.

"Business," as used in the English companies act of 1862 (section 161), permitting the transfer to a new company of the business or property of a corporation being voluntarily wound up, does not include uncalled capital. Bank of China, Japan & The Straits v. Morse, 61 N. E. 774, 780, 168 N. Y. 458, 56 L. R. A. 139, 85 Am. St. Rep. 676.

A statute providing for the taxation of a corporation in a city, town, or county in which their office for "business" is located, cannot be limited to so narrow a construction as to say that it means simply the place where the annual meeting of stockholders or directors is held, which might authorize a corporation to have its place for business located in a farm house, or in some town wherein it had no business, in order to evade taxation, but the Legislature must have used the term in its ordinary significance, and intended it to refer to the place in the state where its principal business operations were carried on. Detroit Transp. Co. v. City of Detroit Assessors, 51 N. W. 978, 980, 91 Mich. 382.

Of court.

1 Rev. St. (5th Ed.) 148, §§ 4, 5, declaring that no court shall be open to transact any "business" on election day, means such business as is to be transacted in open court, and does not embrace a judicial sale conducted by one of the officers of the court. King v. Platt, 37 N. Y. 155, 157.

Of express company.

The word "business," as used in an ordinance providing for license tax on express companies for business done exclusively within the city of Leavenworth, cannot relate to the unloading of goods from the car of the railroad express agent, the hauling them to the city office or the consignee, the receiving the charges thereon, the keeping of the office and books of the company by the agent, or any of the other numerous details of the business in the city, but would relate to a case where the express company received goods or packages in one part of the city and delivered them to another part of the city, and this would be "business" done exclusively within the city. City of Leavenworth v. Smith, 48 Pac. 924, 925, 5 Kan. App. 165.

Of family concerns.

A statute exempting from the payment of tolls persons going on the ordinary domestic "business of family concerns" meant that the business must be ordinary or common business, such as usually requires attention at frequent intervals at the return of the different seasons, or on such occasions of necessity as commonly, though perhaps infrequently, arise. It must be domestic business, and must relate to family concerns. Green Mountain Turnpike Co. v. Hemmingway, 2 Vt. 512, 516.

Of insurance.

69 Ohio Laws, p. 141, § 1, authorizing an insurance company "to carry on the business of insurance," implies that the company could make investments of its capital which is required to pay policies. National Bank of Washington v. Continental Life Ins. Co., 41 Ohio St. 1, 14.

Of manufacturing corporation.

"Business," according to the Standard Dictionary, is, first, a pursuit or occupation; and, second, any occupation connected with the details of trade or industry or commercial affairs, as the banking business. The principal business of a corporation, engaged in the manufacturing and selling its manufactures of iron and steel is such manufacturing and selling and not the banking of its funds derived from its sales, which makes its principal place of business the place where such manufacturing and selling is carried on instead of the place of banking. In re Elmira Steel Co. (U. S.) 109 Fed. 456, 470.

Of a mine.

"Business of a mine," as used in 7 & 8 Geo. IV, c. 31, § 2, allowing compensation for the felonious demolition of any building or erection used in conducting the business of a mine, included all that was done about the mine toward preparing the ore in a marketable state, and was not merely the getting of the rough ore from the mine to the surface. Barwell v. Hundred of Winterstoke, 14 Q. B. 704, 708.

Of vegetables.

A rule charging defendant with conducting "the business of vegetables in a public market" is equivalent to charging the "conducting the business of dealing in, or selling vegetables," since no other "business of vegetables" could be conducted in a public market except that of selling or dealing in them. State v. Cendo, 38 La. Ann. 828, 829.

More hazardous business.

That a person insured under a policy prohibiting the devoting of a building to a more hazardous business lights it with gasoline is not a carrying on of such a business in violation of the provision of the policy. Mutual Fire Ins. Co. v. Coatesville Shoe Factory, 80 Pa. 407.

Whose business it is.

The words "whose business it is," in Act March 3, 1865, providing that every person, firm, or corporation whose business it is as a broker to negotiate the purchase or sales of stocks, etc., shall be regarded as a broker, and shall pay a certain license, operates to limit the term "broker" to those persons only who pursue the business of selling stocks, etc., as a trade or means of making a livelihood. A sale, by a person doing a banking business, of security received by him for the payment of a legitimate loan, does not make him a broker. Warren v. Shook, 91 U. S. 704, 710, 23 L. Ed. 421.

BUSINESS AGENT.

Code Civ. Proc. § 411, authorizing service of process on foreign corporations doing business, and having a managing or "business agent," cashier, or secretary, within the state, by service on such agent, etc., does not mean every man who does any kind of business for a corporation, nor every person who might incidentally or occasionally transact some business for such corporation. The term means one bearing a close relation to the duties of managing agent, cashier, or secretary of the corporation. It must be an agent who is appointed, designated, or authorized to transact and manage one or more distinct branches of business which may be and is conducted and carried on by the corporation within the state where the service is made—one who stands in the shoes of the corporation in relation to the particular business managed, conducted, and controlled by him for the corporation. To constitute a managing or business agent, the agent must be one having in fact a representative capacity and derivative authority, and not one created by construction or implication contrary to the intention of the parties. Doe v. Springfield Boiler & Mfg. Co. (U. S.) 104 Fed. 684, 686, 687, 44 C. C. A. 128 (citing Mulhearn v. Press Pub. Co., 20 Atl. 760, 53 N. J. Law [24 Vroom] 150; Mikolas v. Hiram Walker & Sons, 76 N. W. 36, 73 Minn. 305; Gottschalk Co. v. Distilling & Cattle Feeding Co. [U. S.] 50 Fed. 681; Wall v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. [U. S.] 95 Fed. 398, 400, 37 C. C. A. 129; Denver & R. G. R. Co. v. Roller [U. S.] 100 Fed. 738, 41 C. C. A. 22, 49 L. R. A. 77).

BUSINESS CORPORATION.

A railroad company is a business corporation within the meaning of the bankrupt law, so that its provisions apply to it. Winter v. Iowa, M. & N. P. Ry. Co. (U. S.) 30 Fed. Cas. 329; Adams v. Boston, H. & E. R. Co. (U. S.) 1 Fed. Cas. 90, 92.

An insurance company created by the laws of a state to transact the business of insurance is included in the business corporations to which the provisions of a bankrupt act apply. In re Independent Ins. Co. (U. S.) 13 Fed. Cas. 13, 14; In re Hercules Mut. Life Assur. Co. (U. S.) 12 Fed. Cas. 12.

The fact that an educational institution may acquire and convey property necessary to the accomplishment of its object, and may charge tuition for instruction, does not render it a business or trading corporation. McLeod v. Lincoln Medical College of Cotner University (Neb.) 96 N. W. 265, 266.

BUSINESS HOMESTEAD.

To preserve a place of "business homestead," which is separate and distinct from the home of the family, two things must concur: (1) The head of the family must have a calling or business to which the property is adapted and reasonably necessary; (2) such property must be used as a place to exercise the calling or business of the head of the family. Alexander v. Lovitt (Tex.) 56 S. W. 685, 686 (citing Shryock v. Latimer, 57 Tex. 674).

To protect a place of business as a "business homestead," it must be used as such. It must be used as a place of business for the head of the family, and not for some one else, and it must be reasonably adapted to such business. Thus a house in which the owner formerly carried on a bakery business, but which he had not used for that purpose for seven years, is not exempt as a business homestead, though he expects to go into the bakery business again as soon as he is able. Ford v. Fosgard (Tex.) 25 S. W. 445, 448.

Where machinery constituting partnership assets was adapted to use in a factory, and was attached thereto with the intention of there using it permanently, it became an immovable fixture, and, the partners being married men, it also became a part of the business homesteads of the respective families, and was not subject to mortgage with or without the consent of the wives. Phelan v. Boyd (Tex.) 14 S. W. 290, 294.

BUSINESS HOURS.

See "Usual Business Hours."

There may be little difficulty in towns and cities, where there are business hours, in deciding that a demand should be made for the payment of a note within those hours, but, where no particular hours are known for making and receiving payments, there is more difficulty in determining what would be a reasonable hour for this purpose; the general rule being that the party has all the day to make his payment, which, in relation to bills and notes, should not be so varied as to prevent the maker having a fair opportunity to make arrangements and provide the means of payment before he is subjected to suit. Lunt v. Adams, 17 Me. (5 Shep.) 230, 231.

"Business hours," as used in reference to presenting a note for payment, means that a presentment must be made at a reasonable hour in case the note is not payable at any bank or place where business was transacted during stated hours in each day; and the question whether a presentment is within reasonable time cannot be made to depend on the private and peculiar habits of the maker of the note, not known to the holder, but must be determined on consideration of the circumstances which in ordinary cases would render it seasonable or otherwise. Farnsworth v. Allen, 70 Mass. (4 Gray) 453, 455.

The term "business hours," within which a railway company, in the exercise of due care, is to keep its station open for the delivery of goods, does not necessarily mean the hours of the day during which the company required its station agent's services, but the hours during which persons engaged in business in that community kept their places open generally for the transaction of business. Derosia v. Winona & St. P. R. Co., 18 Minn. 133, 154 (Gil. 119, 138).

As extending to bedtime.

Business hours for the presentation of a bill for payment, except where the paper is due from a bank, generally range through the whole day, down to bedtime in the evening. Cayuga County Bank v. Hunt (N. Y.) 2 Hill, 635, 638.

The rule that the presentment of a note must be made within "business hours" does not mean within the business hours of a bank, when used in reference to a bank which has ceased to do business, in reference to a demand made on an indorser who is the manager of the bank. "When the note is payable at a bank, it is to be presented during banking hours, and the payer is allowed until the expiration of banking hours for payment; but when not to be paid at a bank, but to an individual, presentment may be made at any reasonable time during the day, during what are termed 'business hours,' which, it is held, range through the whole day, to the hours of rest in the evening." Waring v. Betts, 17 S. E. 739, 741, 90 Va. 46, 44 Am. St. Rep. 890.

The term "business hours" in which a bill must be presented for payment, when not considered in connection with banks, means the whole day, down to the hours of rest in the evening. Thus a bill payable at the office of an attorney was held presented in quite reasonable time, as remarked by Best, C. J., though presented at 8 o'clock in the evening in the month of February. Triggs v. Newnham, 1 Car. & P. 631. Lord Ellenborough, in Morgan v. Davison, 1 Starkie, 114, ruled that a bill payable at a counting house was presented at a proper time, though presented between 6 and 7 o'clock in the evening, when no one was left there but a girl to take care of the premises. In another case the note was payable at No. 15 G. street. It was presented between 7 and 8 o'clock in the evening, when the door was found locked, and the messenger was unable, upon knocking, to obtain admission. And Lord Tenterden, C. J., after adverting to the well-known custom in regard to banks, requiring that presentment should be made within business hours, said that in other cases the rule of law is that the bill must be presented at a reasonable hour, and it was accordingly ruled that the presentment was made in a reasonable time. A presentment of a note made at the office of the maker in Chicago at 5:20 p. m., when the office was found locked, held to be a sufficient presentment. Clough v. Holden (Mo.) 20 S. W. 695, 698.

The words "business hours," in Stock Corporation Law, § 53, as amended by Act 1895, c. 384, requiring such a corporation to keep a stockbook open for the inspection of its stockholders and certain others during office hours, are not confined to the hours of business which any particular individual may establish for himself, but, with the exception of banking houses, they range through the whole day, down to the hours of rest in the evening, or at least during the hours which are customarily devoted to business in the particular community where the transaction occurs. Thus a demand made at 3:15 o'clock in the afternoon, while the officer on whom the demand was made was still in his office, was during the usual hours of transacting business, within the contemplation of the statute. Cox v. Island Min. Co., 73 N. Y. Supp. 69, 73, 65 App. Div. 508.

Within the meaning of a rule that a note must be presented for payment during the usual business hours of the day on which it is due, business hours, except in the case of banks, include the whole day, unless there be some known custom or usage of trade to the contrary. And as the general usage of banks is to limit their business transactions to certain hours, a presentment out of banking hours is not sufficient. Swan v. Hodges, 40 Tenn. (3 Head) 251, 252.

BUSINESS HOUSE.

The use of a dwelling house in part by boarders occupying it with the family does not render it a business house, within an ordinance allowing sales of liquor by business houses in the business portion of the city. Shea v. City of Muncie, 46 N. E. 138, 144, 148 Ind. 14.

BUSINESS INSTITUTION.

A trades council is not a business institution; the only element of business in which it was engaged being the furnishing to tradesmen of printed cards certifying that they are proper persons for the members of trades unions to deal with, suitable to be displayed in conspicuous places in such tradesmen's places of business, which was supplemented by the issue of a small pamphlet containing the names and addresses of tradesmen and persons in business in the town, with items of information and advice; no compensation being either required or received by the trades council from the tradespeople for granting or continuing such indorsements. It is in no sense a competing business with the publication of a daily newspaper. Barr v. Essex Trades Council, 30 Atl. 881, 889, 53 N. J. Eq. 101.

BUSINESS LOSSES.

See "Losses of Business."

BUSINESS MANAGER.

See "General Business Manager"; "Manager."

BUSINESS PORTION OR SECTION.

An ordinance forbidding the sale of liquor in the residence portion of a city, and permitting such sale only in the "business portion of the city," does not include a certain part of the city partly used for residence purposes, because a grocery or other business was here and there carried on therein. Shea v. City of Muncie, 46 N. E. 138, 144, 148 Ind. 14.

In an ordinance granting a franchise for lighting the streets of the city, the words "business section" mean that part of the city which is mainly and chiefly devoted to business purposes or uses. It is that part in which stores, factories, offices, shops, and the like, predominate. The word "business" is here used in contradistinction from the word "residential" or "dwelling" or "vacant" or "unoccupied." Capital City Gaslight Co. v. City of Des Moines, 61 N. W. 1066, 1070, 93 Iowa, 547.

BUSINESS PURPOSES.

A letter to the writer's clerk, who had been engaged under a contract for two years to conduct the business of a shipping agent, in which letter the writer inclosed a remittance, with directions that it should be applied to "business purposes," would not exclude the application of a portion of it to the payment of the clerk's salary, in the absence of any evidence that the words should bear a restricted meaning. Smith v. Thompson, 8 C. B. 44, 59.

BUSINESS TAX.

By the acts of 1846, 1858, and 1867, the city of Pittsburg was empowered to levy and collect a tax upon all goods, wares, and merchandise, and upon all articles of trade and commerce, sold in said city. By the act of 1877 it was provided that the city treasurer should prepare a registry or list of all delinquents in business tax, and place the same in the hands of a collector, etc. Held, that the business tax there referred to was the tax for the sale of goods, wares, merchandise, etc., provided for in the previous acts. Appeal of Keystone Bridge Co. (Pa.) 7 Atl. 579, 583.

BUSINESS TIME.

Where an accident policy recites that plaintiff is by occupation a locomotive fireman, a provision that he should have a certain sum per week for 30 weeks' continuous and total loss of such "business time" as might result from accident, refers to his occupation, and does not mean that there is to be no payment unless the insured is incapacitated from performing any kind of business. Pennington v. Pacific Mut. Life Ins. Co., 52 N. W. 482, 483, 85 Iowa, 468, 39 Am. St. Rep. 306.

BUT.

As except.

"But," as used in Const. art. 1, § 9, providing that "the right to trial by jury shall remain inviolate in criminal cases, but a jury in civil cases in all courts," etc., is used in its customary meaning of "except," so that the provision in regard to civil cases is an exception. First Nat. Bank v. Foster, 61 Pac. 466, 467, 9 Wyo. 157, 54 L. R. A. 549.

In 58 Ohio Laws, p. 54, providing that "this act shall not affect the estate by the curtesy of any husband in the real property of his wife after her decease, but during the life of such wife, or any heir of her body, such estate shall not be taken for the payment of his debts," etc., but means "except that." Robert v. Sliffe, 41 Ohio St. 225, 231.

The word "but," as used in Tenn. Const. art. 2, § 28, requiring all taxes to be uniform and equal throughout the state, "but the Legislature shall have the power to tax merchants, peddlers, and privileges in such manner as they may from time to time direct," is significant of the purpose intended to be accomplished. It indicates what follows in an exception to that which has gone before, and is not to be controlled by it. Its meaning is that although in taxing property the Legislature is forbidden to tax it except according to its value, yet as to merchants, peddlers, and privileges the Legislature is not to be restricted, but may exercise the power without restriction either to the amount or as to the manner or mode of exercising the power. Western Union Tel. Co. v. Harris (Tenn.) 52 S. W. 748, 752 (citing Jenkins v. Ewin, 55 Tenn. [8 Heisk.] 456, 478).

"But" indicates the intention of those who use it to limit or restrain the sense or effect of something which had before been said, and is used only with a view of limiting or restraining the preceding language, and not with a view of enlarging it. Stonestreet v. Harrison, 15 Ky. (5 Litt.) 161, 164.

The primary meaning of the word "but" is except, and it is manifestly used in that sense in a statute requiring the taxation of all property but that used for educational and charitable purposes. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. v. Miller, 19 W. Va. 408, 436.

In a constitution providing that none except citizens shall be elected to any office, but the governor and judges must have attained the age of 30, the word "but" indicates that the convention knew that the first clause expressed a general rule, and desired to except from it governors and judges. In other words, it is an exception the same as if, after allowing all voters to be chosen to office, it had said, except the governors and judges must have attained the age of 30. State v. McAllister, 38 W. Va. 485, 502, 18 S. E. 770, 24 L. R. A. 343.

As on the contrary.

Const. art. 9, § 1, providing that revenue shall be raised by levying a tax by valuation so that every person and corporation shall pay a tax in proportion to the value of their property, such value to be ascertained by some person or persons elected or appointed in such manner as the General Assembly shall direct, but the General Assembly shall have power to tax peddlers, auctioneers, brokers, and express interests or business, and persons or corporations owning or using franchises and privileges, in such manner as it shall from time to time direct by general law, held, that the word "but" is used in an exceptive or adversitive sense, and means "on the contrary" or "on the other hand." Sterling Gas Co. v. Higby, 25 N. E. 660, 662, 134 Ill. 557.

The word "but," as used in Acts 1901, c. 4912, providing that when bonds of a county have been issued they shall not be held invalid on account of any irregularity in the proceedings, but wherever disposed of for value then they shall be in full force and effect, is used conjunctively in the sense of "on the contrary." Potter v. Lainhart (Fla.) 33 South. 251, 259.

As or.

In a will directing that, on the death of testator's daughter, one-half the income of the residue of his estate should be paid to his son, and upon decease of testator's wife, if his son survive her, then the whole of such net income should be paid to the son for life, but, in case the son should die leaving testator's wife surviving, then, during the life of such wife, the widow of the son should receive one-third of his share of the income, "but" is almost identical in meaning with the word "or," which may be substituted for it. In re Cox's Estate, 36 Atl. 564, 565, 180 Pa. 139.

As yet or still.

"But" may, in order to give effect to the obvious intent of a statute, be considered to mean "yet" or "still." Adams v. Yazoo & M. V. R. Co., 22 South. 824, 825, 75 Miss. 275.

As word of limitation.

In a will providing, "I also give, devise, and bequeath to my wife, E., all the rest and residue of my real estate, but, on her decease, the remainder thereof, if any, I give and devise to my said children," "but" is a word of limitation, and shows that the testator intended that the previous gift, which was apparently absolute, should not remain absolute, but should be limited by that which followed. It indicates a proviso, condition, or qualification, and, in connection with the rest of the sentence, reduces the previous gift by carving out, not an absolute, but a possible, remainder for the children. Leggett v. Firth, 29 N. E. 950, 132 N. Y. 7.

BUTCHER.

The ordinary and natural understanding of the word "butcher" is one who kills and sells cattle for human food. Blumhardt v. Rohr, 17 Atl. 266, 268, 70 Md. 328.

"Butcher" means a person who cuts and sells meat as well as a person who actually slaughters animals and dresses the carcasses. Green v. State, 19 S. W. 1055, 56 Ark. 386.

A "butcher," as defined by Webster, is one who slaughters animals or dresses their flesh for market; one whose occupation is to kill animals for food. It is quite well to designate one conducting a meat shop as a "butcher," yet it is perhaps improper, and it will be more correct to say that he who slaughters the animals and prepares them for market is a butcher, while he who sells the flesh at a store is the keeper of a meat market. And where an ordinance intended to regulate and license the vending of meat or meat markets uses the word "butcher," as the meaning is obvious, and as it has a right by its charter to license such markets, the word "butcher" will be construed to mean the keeper of a meat market. City of Rockville v. Merchant, 60 Mo. App. 365, 369.

Rev. Law, § 101, requiring butchers to take out license, will be held to mean a person who himself actually slaughters the animals to be used as food; and, although a butcher might, or might not, cut up and sell by retail in the market the bodies of the animals he had slaughtered, a person who merely buys the bodies of the animals already slaughtered for meat, and cuts them up and retails them at a market stall, is not a butcher, within the meaning of the law. Henback v. State, 53 Ala. 523, 526, 25 Am. Rep. 650.

"Butcher," as used in Act 1881, c. 149, § 4, imposing a privilege tax on butchers, etc., means a person who kills animals to sell their flesh. It does not include the keeper of a family grocery under a merchants' license, though he may retail meat during a small part of the year, limiting the business to a particular class of meats purchased from farmers. Eastman v. Jackson, 78 Tenn. (10 Lea) 162, 163.

BUTCHER SHOP.

As store, see "Store."

It is not necessary to constitute a butcher shop that animals shall be actually slaughtered and dressed there for market, but a shop used exclusively for the sale of meat is a butcher shop, though no animals are slaughtered or dressed there. Green v. State, 19 S. W. 1055, 56 Ark. 386.

"Butcher shop" is a synonymous term with "meat market." Wiest v. Luyendyk, 41 N. W. 839, 840, 73 Mich. 661.

BUTCHERED.

The word "butchered," as used in a dying declaration that the injured man had been butchered by the doctors, simply means killed in an unusual, cruel, or wanton manner. State v. Gile, 8 Wash. 12, 22, 35 Pac. 417.

BUTTER.

See "Imitation Butter"; "Process Butter."

For the purpose of the provision relating to the sale of adulterated cheese or butter, the terms "butter" and "cheese" mean the products usually known by those names, and which are manufactured exclusively from milk or cream, or both, with salt and rennet, and with or without coloring matter. Rev. St. Me. 1883, p. 923, c. 128, § 6.

For the purpose of the statutory provisions relative to the sale of imitation butter and cheese, the terms "butter" and

"cheese" shall mean the products which are usually known by these names, and are manufactured exclusively from milk or cream, with salt and rennet, and with or without coloring matter. Rev. Laws Mass. 1902, p. 547, c. 56, § 35.

For the purposes of acts relating to the sale of imitation butter, the term "butter" shall be understood to mean the product usually known by that name, and which is manufactured exclusively from milk or cream, or both. Gen. St. Minn. 1894, § 6991. The term "butter," as used in the chapter of the Penal Code relating to adulterated dairy products, is understood to mean the product usually known by that name, and which is manufactured exclusively from milk or cream, or both. Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 7648.

The terms "butter" and "cheese" shall be understood to mean the products usually known by those names, and which are manufactured exclusively from milk or cream, or both, with salt, and with or without coloring matter, and, if cheese, with rennet. Pub. St. N. H. 1901, p. 402, c. 127, § 22.

The term "butter" shall mean the product usually known by that name, manufactured exclusively from milk or cream, or both, with or without salt or coloring matter. V. S. 1894, § 4340.

The word "butter," as used in an act relating to oleomargarine, shall be understood to mean the food product usually known as butter, and which is made exclusively from milk or cream, or both, with or without common salt, and with or without additional coloring matter. U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 2228. The term "butter," as used in an act relating to oleomargarine, is defined to mean an article of food, as defined in Act Aug. 2, 1886. Supp. U. S. Comp. St. 1903, p. 267.

The world has but one understanding of what is meant by the word "butter," and we must assume that such is the sense that the Legislature used the term in Pub. Act 1901, No. 22, entitled an act to prevent deception in the manufacture and sale of imitation butter. A fair inference from the statute is that the Legislature undertook to prevent deception by preventing the sale of any yellow oleomargarine, and it undertook to accomplish this by prohibiting the coloring of oleomargarine yellow, and this is fairly within the title. People v. Rotter, 91 N. W. 167, 168, 131 Mich. 250.

Under the express provisions of Ohio act to prevent deception in the sale of dairy product, the terms "natural butter and cheese produced from pure, unadulterated milk, or cream from the same," "butter and cheese made from unadulterated milk or cream," "butter or cheese, the product of the dairy," and "butter and cheese," shall be understood to mean the products usually known by the term "butter and cheese," and which butter is manufactured exclusively from pure milk or cream, or both, with salt, and with or without harmless coloring matter, and which cheese is manufactured exclusively from pure milk or cream, or both, with salt and rennet, and with or without any harmless coloring matter or sage. State v. Capital City Dairy, 57 N. E. 62, 64, 62 Ohio St. 330, 57 L. R. A. 181.

BUTTERINE.

Butterine or oleomargarine is a name given to compounds resembling butter in appearance and flavor, put on the market as substitutes for it. A law requiring such substitutes to be distinctly labeled is within the police power of the state. Butler v. Chambers, 30 N. W. 308, 309, 36 Minn. 69, 1 Am. St. Rep. 638.

BUTTY COLLIERIES.

"Butty colliers" are two or more working colliers who join together and enter into agreements with their employers to get coal or iron from certain pits at so much a yard or so much a ton, and are in the habit of doing work themselves, and of employing other men under them, to increase the quantity raised. Bowers v. Lovekin, 6 El. & Bl. 584.

BUY.

See "Agreement to Buy."

"Buy," as used in an indictment charging that defendants did feloniously, and with intent to defraud a certain person, "buy" from him a certain team of horses, should be construed in the sense of negotiating, and not that the defendants gave a good consideration for the horses obtained. Pinney v. State, 59 N. E. 383, 384, 156 Ind. 167.

The phrase, "buy stock and carry it on a margin," in a statement that a customer employs a broker to buy stock for him and carry it on a margin, imports that the stock shall be actually bought and actually received by the broker; and, if in such case the stock is actually bought and actually received by the broker, the transaction is not within St. 1890, c. 437, providing that whoever contracts to buy on margin any securities, having at the time no intention to perform by actual receipt and payment, may sue for any payment made, provided that the other party had reasonable cause to believe that no intention to actually perform existed. Marks v. Metropolitan Stock Exch., 63 N. E. 410, 411, 181 Mass. 251.

As authority to pledge.

An authority to buy and sell by no means implies authority to pledge. Trent v. Sherlock, 66 Pac. 700, 701, 26 Mont. 85.

Discount distinguished.

Buying a note, as distinguished from discounting it, is a transaction where the seller does not indorse the note, and is not accountable for it. Farmers' & Mechanics' Bank v. Baldwin, 23 Minn. 198, 206, 23 Am. Rep. 683; Newell v. First Nat. Bank of Somerset, 13 Ky. Law Rep. 775, 777 (citing Bouv. Dict.); Neillsville Bank v. Tuthill, 30 N. W. 154, 155, 4 Dak. 295 (citing 1 Bouv. Law Dict. tit. "Discount").

BUYER.

See "Public Buyer."

"Buyer" is a term used in the law of sales to designate the person purchasing the goods which is the subject of a sale. Eldridge v. Kuehl, 27 Iowa, 160, 173.

BUYER'S OPTION.

"Buyer's option," as used in an order to buy stock on a 60 days' buyer's option, means with a right on the part of the purchaser to take and pay for it at any time within 60 days, if he chooses. Pickering v. Demeritt, 100 Mass. 416, 421.

BUYER'S RISK.

A contract of sale to be shipped to purchasers "f. o. b. California, buyers' risk," did not impose on the purchasers the assumption of the risk of any damage resulting from improper packing or shipping in a defective car, where the seller was the owner and shipper, but only such risk as arose after the contract was entered into. Rose v. Weinberger, 37 S. E. 868, 112 Ga. 628; Rose v. Weinberger, 34 S. E. 28, 29, 108 Ga. 533, 75 Am. St. Rep. 73.

BUYING OF TITLES.

Buying of titles is the buying or selling of lands out of the possession of the vendor, and held adversely at the time. This was for a long period an offense, the contract being champertous. The sale of such a title is not a valid consideration for a promise. Whitaker v. Cone, 2 Johns. Cas. 58, 59; Brinley v. Whiting, 22 Mass. (5 Pick.) 348, 356.

BY.

In its primitive sense the word "by" expresses relation to place, though by its various, remote, and casual associations that meaning is variously modified. In relation to place it clearly does signify at or near, but its import is more definite when used to express the relation of time. In this application it signifies on or before. The popular signification of words, that which use had made familiar in the affairs of men, must be adopted in giving construction to their agreements. Ferguson v. Coleman (S. C.) 3 Rich. Law, 99, 100, 45 Am. Dec. 761.

Lord Coke says that the word "by" or "bye" signifies habitation. Hanna v. Nassau Electric R. Co., 18 App. Div. 137, 142, 45 N. Y. Supp. 437, 440.

As according to.

In an agreement that the issues and questions arising in one proceeding shall be settled and determined by the final judgment in other proceedings, "by" will be construed to mean "according to." "The preposition 'by' is often used in the sense, and this is one of its definitions." Haubert v. Haworth, 78 Pa. (28 P. F. Smith) 78, 83, (citing Webster's Dict.).

Agency indicated.

"By its trustees," as used in a declaration stating that an action was brought by the Fifth Baptist Church, by its trustees, are not a part of the name of the plaintiff, but are inserted, like "by attorney" or "next friend," to indicate by whose agency, and not in whose behalf, the action is brought. Baltimore & P. R. Co. v. Fifth Baptist Church, 11 Sup. Ct. 185, 186, 137 U. S. 568, 34 L. Ed. 784.

"By, per, pro," attached to a signature, and adding a description thereto, such as "cashier," "secretary," "president," or "agent," sufficiently indicates and shows that such person signed an official name in the capacity stated alone, and not personally. The use of the words "by," "per," or "pro" does not necessarily add to the certainty of what is thus expressed, and it is common to use these words in commercial business, it being sufficiently understood that the paper is signed by the officer or agent named, and for the corporation. Liebscher v. Kraus, 43 N. W. 166, 167, 74 Wis. 387, 5 L. R. A. 496, 17 Am. St. Rep. 171.

"Injuries done to person or property," as used in Rev. Code, 1845, § 1, subdiv. 4, making steamboats liable for injuries done to persons or property by said boat or vessel, means injuries in which the boat is an agent, such as collisions and the like, and does not embrace the act of the captain thereof in putting an employé ashore in violation of the contract of employment. Blass v. The Robert Campbell, 16 Mo. 266, 267.

The provision that an application for a writ of certiorari must be made "by or in behalf of" the party aggrieved authorizes verification by a duly authorized attorney. In re Belmont, 81 N. Y. Supp. 280, 281. 40 Misc. Rep. 133.

As alongside.

Logs found in a mill pond on the line of a railroad, and three or four rods from it, may well be said to be "lying by the railroad." Hopkins v. Rays, 44 Atl. 102, 68 N. H. 164, 73 Am. St. Rep. 554.

As along the line of.

Where a deed described the line of the premises intended to be conveyed as running by the land of D. the word "by" is to be construed as meaning "along the line of," and not as meaning "over" or "across." Balley v. White, 41 N. H. 837, 343.

As used in a deed stating one call to Smith's land, and thence by said Smith's land to a certain point, means along the external boundary of the land. "The word 'by' does not mean 'over,' or 'across,' but along the line of Smith's land, and such is both its legal and common acceptance." Peaslee v. Gee, 19 N. H. 273, 277.

The words, "to" "from," and "by," when used to express boundaries, ordinarily mean terms of exclusion, and are always to be understood in that way, unless there is something in the connection which makes it manifest that they were used in a different sense. Wells v. Jackson Iron Mfg. Co., 48 N. H. 491, 537.

Bounding of one piece of land "by" another piece, whether such other be long or narrow, or in any other form, locates the line at an edge, and not through the middle of the adjoining premises. Woodman v. Spencer, 54 N. H. 507, 511.

As at request of.

A complaint charged that the plaintiff, as treasurer of a corporation, acting under the direction of its directors, expended $800 in its behalf over and above his receipts from its funds, and that the corporation was indebted to him. Held, that the phrase "under and by the direction of the board of directors" simply meant that the expenditures were made at the request of the company. Simmons v. Sisson, 26 N. Y. 264, 275.

As in.

In Const. art. 4, § 24, providing that no lottery shall be authorized "by this state," the phrase "by this state," is synonymous with the phrase "in the state," and the effect of the provision is not only to limit the legislative power to create public lotteries to be conducted and managed solely by the state for the purpose of raising revenues, but it also prohibits the state from authorizing any lottery for any purpose, public or private. State v. Overton, 16 Nev. 136, 149.

As on or before.

Where an order for goods made subject to countermand "by a certain time" was altered by the writing of the word "before" over the word "by," the alteration was immaterial, it not having changed the meaning of the order. Express Pub. Co. v. Aldine Press, 17 Atl. 603, 609, 126 Pa. 347.

A contract to do a certain thing or complete work "by a certain time" should be construed to require completion of the contract before the time specified. Rankin v. Woodworth, 3 Pen. & W. 48.

"By," as used in a contract to deliver barley, requiring a delivery by a certain day, is practically synonymous with "on" or "before" that day, and hence it was no fatal variance that the declaration alleged that the contract required a delivery on or before the day. Coonley v. Anderson (N. Y.) 1 Hill, 519, 522.

"By," in a notice that premises will be vacated by January 1st, evidently meant that the premises would be vacated when that time had arrived; that is to say, before that time. Wilson v. Rodeman, 8 S. E. 855, 857, 30 S. C. 210.

"By," as used in Hill's Ann. Laws, § 541, providing that appellant must by the second day of next term file with the clerk a transcript, means "on" the second day, and not "before." Wachsmuth v. Routledge, 51 Pac. 443, 444, 36 Or. 307 (citing Richardson v. Ford, 14 Ill. [4 Peck] 332).

The word "by," as used in a contract for the construction of a building, and containing a stipulation that the contractor shall finish the house by April 1st, means before April 1st. Miller v. Phillips, 31 Pa. (7 Casey) 218, 221.

"By" has many significations, but when used to designate a terminal point of time it is defined by the Century Dictionary to mean "not later than; as early as"; the Standard defines it "not later than"; and Webster, "not later than; as soon as"; and, as used in an agreement that a subscription was not to be binding unless a certain sum was subscribed "by July 1st," meant that the whole amount should be subscribed not later than July 1st. Elizabeth City Cotton Mills v. Dunstan, 27 S. E. 1001, 121 N. C. 12, 61 Am. St. Rep. 654.

The word "by," as used in an order extending the time for a party to file his notice of motion for a new trial from December 23, 1878, until January 9, 1879, and also ordering that the bill of exceptions and statement be filed "by" January 20, 1879, allows the party to file his bill of exceptions and statement on January 20, 1879. Higley v. Gilmer, 3 Mont. 433, 438.

In an option given February 7th, provided no better offer was received that day by mail, to close "by February 8th" includes the latter day. Blalock v. Clark, 45 S. E. 642, 643, 133 N. C. 306.

As through the means of.

"By," as used in Stock Corporation Law, § 48, providing that no conveyance or transfer of any property by any corporation which shall have refused to pay any of its notes or other obligations, when due by it or any of its officers, directors, or stockholders, will be construed as equivalent to the phrase "through the means, act, or instrumentality of," so that the section would read, "no conveyance, assignment, or transfer of any property of any such corporation by it, or effected through the means, act, or instrumentality of any one who is an officer, director, or stockholder thereof, shall be valid;" and hence it is not necessary that a director should act officially in making the transfer. O'Brien v. East River Bridge Co., 55 N. Y. Supp. 206, 208, 36 App. Div. 17.

In Gen. St. c. 161, § 54, providing that whoever designedly, by false pretense, obtains any property from another, shall be punished, the phrase "false pretense" is substantially equivalent to the words "by means of a false pretense" or "under false color and pretense," and an indictment charging that the defendant obtained goods under a false and fraudulent pretense was sufficient to meet the requirements of the statute. Commonwealth v. Walker, 108 Mass. 309, 313.

As to.

In a complaint under St. 1869, c. 415, § 32, for the unlawful selling of intoxicating liquor, a description of the person to whom the sale was made as a certain person whose name is not known "by" the complainant will be construed to mean "to," and therefore to be sufficiently precise and formal, though the preposition "to" should have been used instead of "by" in averring complainant's want of knowledge of the name of the person to whom the liquor was sold. Commonwealth v. Griffin, 105 Mass. 175, 176.

As the whole length of.

A description in a deed, which described the line bounding the property as running "thence by the lands" of a certain person, does not indicate that the whole of the line is along the lands designated. If the line ran partially so only, it would answer the description. Rieglesville Del. Bridge Co. v. Bloom, 7 Atl. 478, 479, 48 N. J. Law (19 Vroom) 368.

By a bay, creek, pond, river, slough, strait, or stream.

The words "to," "by," "along," "with," "in," "up," or "down," a creek, river, slough, strait, or bay, mean the middle of the main channel thereof, unless otherwise expressed. Pol. Code Cal. 1903, § 3906; Pol. Code Mont. 1895, § 4106.

The words "by the pond," used to designate a boundary of land, are to be construed as fixing the boundary in the center of the pond. Lowell v. Robinson, 16 Me. 357, 361, 33 Am. Dec. 671.

"By," as used in grant of land bounded by a fresh water stream, means to the thread of the stream. Morgan v. Reading, 11 Miss. (3 Smedes & M.) 366, 399.

A deed in which it is recited that part of the land is "bounded by the river" means that the grant extends to the thread of the river. Lunt v. Holland, 14 Mass. 149, 150.

A deed, the description of which recites that the property conveyed is bounded on one side "by" a certain river, means that the grantee takes title to the bed of the water course. Hayes' Ex'r v. Bowman (Va.) 1 Rand. 417, 420.

By a highway or street.

Where, in stating the course of a line along a river, it is described as running to a stake by the river, the word "by" makes the river a boundary. Rix v. Johnson, 5 N. H. 520, 522, 22 Am. Dec. 472.

A boundary "on a stream," or "by a stream," or "to a stream," includes the flats, at least to low-water mark, and, in many cases, to the middle thread of the river. Thomas v. Hatch (U. S.) 23 Fed. Cas. 946, 949.

A deed describing land as bounded "by" a highway or street is to be construed as including the land to the center of the street or highway. Fraser v. Ott, 30 Pac. 793, 794, 95 Cal. 661; Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Gould, 8 Atl. 754, 756, 67 Md. 60; Hollenbeck v. Rowley, 90 Mass. (8 Allen) 473, 475; Holloway v. Delano, 18 N. Y. Supp. 700, 703, 64 Hun, 27; Cochran v. Smith, 26 N. Y. Supp. 103, 105, 73 Hun, 597; Firmstone v. Spaeter, 25 Atl. 41, 150 Pa. 616, 30 Am. St. Rep. 851; Lee v. Lee (N. Y.) 27 Hun, 1, 4.

As used in a deed describing land as bounded "by a public highway or street," it will be considered as bounded by the center of the street, unless it clearly appears that it was intended to make the side line of the street a boundary instead of the center. Moody v. Palmer, 50 Cal. 31, 36.

"There can be no doubt that ordinarily, when one conveys property bounded 'by a street' then actually opened and used, in the absence of any fact to show a contrary intent, the description will be deemed to carry the title to the center of the highway. But that presumption is not a conclusive presumption of law. It is only a presumption of fact, existing because of what is supposed to be the intention of the parties to the transaction, and it is subject to be overruled, and another construction given to the deed, if a contrary intention can fairly be inferred by reference to the situation of the lands and the condition and relations of the parties to them. This presumption arises from the fact that ordinarily the state, when it takes land for highway purposes, does not take the fee of the property, but only the right to use and occupy the land so taken for the purposes of the highway, leaving the naked fee in the owner for whom the land is taken; and when that owner conveys land abutting upon the highway, if the fee of the highway did not also pass to his grantee, there would be left a strip of land the width of the highway, as to which the original owner would own the fee, without any rights except to use it as a highway, and the abutting owner, not having the fee, would have no power to enforce his rights against a person who sought to use the highway for any purpose to which it was not properly to be devoted. To obviate this, it has been held that, although the highway was not included in terms in the deed, yet, where land is conveyed bounded by an existing highway, the fee did pass to the abutter; but, where the fee of the land used for the highway is owned by the state, that presumption cannot arise, nor is there any reason for its existence." Graham v. Stern, 64 N. Y. Supp. 728, 729, 51 App. Div. 406.

Where a part of the description in a deed read "thence by said road" easterly to the place of beginning, the phrase "thence by said road" meant a grant to the margin of the road, and did not carry title to any of the land embraced within the road. Sibley v. Holden, 27 Mass. (10 Pick.) 249, 20 Am. Dec. 521.

A conveyance of real estate describing the property as "by and along" a certain public highway does not carry with it the fee to the center of the road as part and parcel of the grant. Peabody Heights Co. v. Sadtler, 63 Md. 533, 537, 52 Am. Rep. 519.

In the case of land bounded "by a highway," the grant extends to the center of the highway; but where it is bounded by and along the side of such highway, the boundary is fixed at the side thereof, leaving still in the grantor the fee of the land over which the highway passes, subject only to the easement of public right of way. Child v. Starr (N. Y.) 4 Hill, 369, 382.

Where a conveyance of city lots described the premises as bounded "southerly by the northerly line or side of T's lane," the grantee was limited to the northerly side of the lane, and the description did not carry him to the center thereof. Jones v. Cowman, 4 N. Y. Super. Ct. (2 Sandf.) 234, 237.

A grant of land described as bordering "on, along, or by" a highway will by legal implication carry a fee to the center of a road, as the law never presumes that, in parting with his interest in the land adjoining a public way, the grantor meant to reserve the fee in the way subject to the public easement. But this presumption, like all other presumptions, may be rebutted, and if it plainly appears from the language used and the nature of the property that the grantor meant to limit the grant to the line of the road, and reserve for himself the fee in the roadbed subject to the use of it by the public as a highway, then, of course, this plainly expressed intention must prevail. So a deed conveying land by metes and bounds, where one of the boundary lines is described as "extending to a post standing on the south side of the road, thence bounding the road north 87 degrees west," establishes a boundary at the side, and not at the center, of the highway. Hunt v. Brown, 23 Atl. 1029, 75 Md. 481.

The phrase "by said road on the easterly and northerly side thereof," as descriptive of the boundary of land, will be construed, unless a contrary intent appears on the face of the deed of the land, to fix the line as the easterly and northerly side of the road, and not at the center line of the road. Holmes v. Turner's Falls Co., 8 N. E. 646, 651, 142 Mass. 590.

A description in a deed in which one boundary is given as a line running by the highway, and by the land of another, shows an intention to make the line of an adjoining landowner the boundary line in that direction. Thompson v. Major, 58 N. H. 242, 245.

By a mountain or ridge.

The words "to," "on," "along," "with," or "by" a mountain or ridge, mean summit point, or summit line, unless otherwise expressed. Pol. Code Cal. 1903, § 3905; Pol. Code Mont. 1895, § 4105.

By the shore line.

The words "along," "with," "by," or "on," the shore line, mean on a line parallel with and three miles from the shore. Pol. Code Cal. 1903, § 3907.

BY ANY FALSE PRETENSE

The false assertion of possession of money, on the credit whereof goods were obtained, is a false pretense within Act July 12, 1842, § 21, P. L. 345, providing that "every person who, with intent to cheat or defraud another, shall . . . by any false pretense whatever, obtain from any person any money," etc. Commonwealth v. Burdick, 2 Pa. (2 Barr) 163, 164, 44 Am. Dec. 188.

BY AUTHORITY.

Where the phrase "by authority" is printed on the title page of a volume purporting to contain the laws of another state, such phrase sufficiently shows that it is printed by the authority of the Legislature of that state, and hence warrants its admission in evidence. Merrifield v. Robbins, 74 Mass. (8 Gray) 150, 151.

The phrase "by authority of," as used in a recital in municipal bonds to the effect that they are issued by authority of the provisions of a given statute, means an assertion that in issuing the bonds the provisions of the statute designated have been followed or conformed to. Bates v. Riverside Independent School Dist. (U. S.) 25 Fed. 192, 194.

BY CONFESSION.

See "Judgment by Confession."

As used in a justice's judgment docket declaring that judgment was entered "by confession," the term "by confession" is surplusage, and was evidently inadvertently used as synonymous with the words by consent. Jewett v. Sunback, 58 N. W. 20, 22, 5 S. D. 111.

BY THE COURT.

Where in partition, after a trial by jury as to certain issues, the action is, by consent of the parties, proceeded with before the court, and it makes additional findings of facts, the trial is not "by the court without a jury." Bowen v. Sweeney, 38 N. E. 271, 143 N. Y. 349.

BY DIRECT LINE.

Where a portion of a tract of land was bounded with reference to a stream, it was held that the terms "by direct line" showed that the meander of the stream was not intended, but that it was intended to close the survey by a single line drawn from one point to another. Thomas' Lessee v. Godfrey (Md.) 8 Gill & J. 142, 152.

BY THE DRINK.

Rev. St. 1845, p. 343, declares that all accounts of grocers or other retailers of spirituous liquors, for liquors retailed, sold, or delivered for a greater or higher amount than 50 cents, shall be void, excepting that the act should not prevent any grocer, retailer, or other person from selling spirituous liquors in larger quantities than a quart, and recovering for the same. In an action to recover on an account, where the evidence showed that a large part of the account was for whisky sold to the defendant, "by the drink" could not be construed to mean a quart, so as to bring the sale within the provision of the exception of the act, but clearly meant sales at retail in quantities less than a quart. Sappington v. Carter, 67 Ill. 482, 485.

BY ESTIMATION.

The words "contained by estimation," following a description of land in a deed, indicates that the statement of the quantity of acres in a deed is mere matter of description, not of the essence of the contract, and the buyer takes the risk of the quantity if there be no intermixture of fraud in the case. Jenkins v. Bolgiano, 53 Md. 407, 420; Weart v. Rose, 16 N. J. Eq. (1 C. E. Green) 290, 297; Stebbins v. Eddy (U. S.) 22 Fed. Cas. 1192, 1194.

Where a deed describes the land conveyed as a specified number of acres by estimation, the phrase "by estimation" intimates that a positive declaration as to quantity was not intended; but where there is a gross error in the estimated quantity, the party injured will be relieved in equity, as for instance where a mortgage was executed upon real estate to secure the payment of the balance of purchase money, and the difference between the quantity of land expressed in the deed and that actually contained in the tract was greater in value than the amount secured by the mortgage, the vendee was entitled to abatement. Mendenhall v. Steckel, 47 Md. 453, 465, 28 Am. Rep. 481.

"The terms 'by estimation,' 'more or less,' or other expressions of similar import, added to a statement of quantity, are only to be considered as covering inconsiderable or small differences one way or the other, and do not in themselves determine the character of the sale." Hays v. Hays, 25 N. E. 600, 126 Ind. 92, 11 L. R. A. 376.

A contract for the sale of goods said to contain a certain quantity "by estimation" is to be construed to authorize only such a slight variation from the quantity designated in the contract as, from the circumstances of the case or the nature of the articles, may seem reasonable to the court. Brawley v. United States, 96 U. S. 168, 171, 24 L. Ed. 622.

"Containing by estimation," as used in a deed reciting that the premises conveyed contained by estimation a certain number of square feet, is equivalent to the words "more or less," and such words control the statement of the quantity or of the length of the lines, so that the purchaser will not be entitled to relief under a written contract to sell. Tarbell v. Bowman, 103 Mass. 341, 344.

BY FIRE.

See "Loss by Fire."

BY THE FIRST BOAT.

An order for goods which directed that they be forwarded "by the first boat" meant that they should be forwarded at the earliest opportunity. Johnson v. Chambers, 12 Ind. 102, 113.

BY FORCE OF.

A reinsurance policy by which the insurer agreed to pay all such sums as the insured may, "by force of such policies," become liable to pay, renders the insurer liable where the insured was compelled to pay for a failure to keep alive a certain policy by receiving payments when tendered, it being by the force of the contract that the insured became liable. Fisher v. Hope Mut. Life Ins. Co., 69 N. Y. 161, 163; Fischer v. Same, 40 N. Y. Super. Ct. (8 Jones & S.) 291, 299.

BY THE HANDS OF JUSTICE.

See "Die by the Hand of Justice."

BY HIS EXPRESS DIRECTION.

Where it appeared that the witness wrote the testator's name at the end of the will "at his own request," the jury might infer that he wrote it, in the words of the statute, "by his express direction," which means that the authority for it must be actively and positively conferred, not passively by silent acquiescence. Barr v. Graybill, 13 Pa. (1 Harris) 396, 399.

BY HIS OWN ACT.

See "Die by His Own Hand or Act."

BY HIS OWN HAND.

See "Die by His Own Hand or Act."

BY THE INDEMNIFIED.

As used in the condition of a credit insurance policy to a firm, providing that it should be void in the event of discontinuance of business "by the indemnified," the phrase quoted has relation to the act of the indemnified (either his voluntary act or the consequence of his voluntary act), and not to the death of one of the firm. American Credit Indemnity Co. v. Cassard, 34 Atl. 703, 704, 83 Md. 272.

BY THE LAW OF THE LAND.

The term "by the law of the land," etc., in Bill of Rights, art. 12, providing that "no man shall be arrested, imprisoned, etc., but by the judgment of his peers, or the law of the land," cannot, we think, be used in their most bald and literal sense, to mean the law of the land at the time of the trial, because the laws may be shaped and altered by the Legislature from time to time, and such a provision, intended to prohibit the making of any law impairing the ancient rights and liberties of the subject, would under such a construction be wholly nugatory and void. The Legislature might simply change the law by statute, and thus remove the landmark and the barrier intended to be set up by this provision in the Bill of Rights. It must therefore have intended the ancient established law and course of legal proceedings, by an adherence to which our ancestors in England, before the settlement of this country, and the emigrants themselves and their descendants, had found safety for their personal rights. Jones v. Robbins, 74 Mass. (8 Gray) 329, 342, 343 (quoting 2 Kent, Comm. [6th Ed.] 13).

BY MEANS OF.

A policy of insurance conditioned to pay all loss which might happen "by means of fire" would not cover a loss occasioned by removal of the goods from the building on account of fire in contiguous property, though there was a reasonable apprehension that the goods would be reached by the flames. Hillier v. Allegheny County Mut. Ins. Co., 3 Pa. (3 Barr) 470, 471, 45 Am. Dec. 656.

An indictment alleging that the killing was done "with and by means of" poison sufficiently charges the mode of killing. State v. Labounty, 21 Atl. 730, 731, 63 Vt. 374.

BY OPERATION OF LAW.

See "Surrender by Operation of Law."

The term "by operation of law," as used in relation to assignments—that is, assignments by operation of law—means cases where the title or right of property vests in a person, not by his own act or agreement, but by the single operation of law, as in the case of the devolution of title upon an administrator, or where the estate of an intestate is cast upon the heir. Burke v. Backus, 53 N. W. 458, 459, 51 Minn. 174.

Civ. Code, § 1511, providing that failure to perform an executory contract shall be excused where it is prevented "by operation of law," means an interference by some positive legal rule or enactment; and a writ sued out by a private litigant will not excuse the non-performance of a contract, although it may deprive the contractor of the means of performance, but such deprivation is not by operation of law; it is the act of an individual, and not of the government. Klauber v. San Diego Street Car Co., 30 Pac. 555, 556, 95 Cal. 353.

BY POISON.

Where injuries resulting from poison or contact with poisonous substances are excepted in an insurance policy, the insurer is not liable for injuries resulting from carbolic acid being thrown in the face of the insured. There is a very evident distinction between the words "by taking of poison" and "by poison." The expression "by taking of poison" may very well be held to mean the internal use of poison, but such cannot be considered the meaning of the words of the certificate in this case, except by a forced construction. This distinction is pointed out by Judge Gray, in his opinion in the case of Paul v. Travelers' Ins. Co., 20 N. E. 347, 112 N. Y. 472, 3 L. R. A. 443, 8 Am. St. Rep. 758, where the words "inhaling of gas" were under consideration in connection with a clause in a policy relieving the defendant from liability for injuries occasioned by the "inhaling of gas." The court there held that those words applied only to a voluntary and intelligent action on the part of insured. The death of insured was occasioned by the gas being turned on in a room where insured was sleeping and breathing the air impregnated with the gas. Judge Gray says: "If the policy had said that it was not to extend to any death caused wholly or in part by gas, it would have expressed precisely what the appellant now says is meant by the present phrase, and there could have been no room for doubt." Here the words of the certificate are "by poison," and not "by taking of poison," making the language of Judge Gray directly in point. Meehan v. Traders' & Travelers' Acc. Co., 68 N. Y. Supp. 821, 822, 34 Misc. Rep. 158.

BY REASON OF.

An allegation in a complaint that certain injuries were caused "by reason and in consequence of" defendant's negligence is equivalent to an allegation that the injury was caused wholly by defendant's negligence, or without the fault of plaintiff, and is therefore a sufficient allegation that the plaintiff is not guilty of contributory negligence. Benedict v. Union Agricultural Soc., 52 Atl. 110, 113, 74 Vt. 91.

BY RIGHT OF REPRESENTATION.

Inheritance by "right of representation" takes place when the linal descendant of any deceased heir takes the same share or portion of the estate of an intestate that the parent of such descendant would have taken, if living. B. & C. Comp. Or. § 5590.

The words "by right of representation," as used in a will providing that the residue shall go "in equal shares by right of representation" to testator's nephews and nieces, means that they should take per stirpes. Siders v. Siders, 48 N. E. 277, 169 Mass. 523.

BY STATUTE.

By "the enacting clause," or "by statute," as used in the books, is meant such an enacting clause or statute provision as creates an offense and gives a penalty. When it is said "where an action is given by statute or by the enacting clause," and in another section, or subsequent statute, exceptions are enacted, the plaintiff need not notice them. Berry v. Stinson, 23 Me. (10 Shep.) 140, 144.

BY THE SIDE OF.

See "Side."

BY THE STATE.

In a statute making it invalid for any person to sell or dispose of intoxicating liquors within three miles of a certain railroad during the construction of the road, unless "licensed by the state," the words "unless licensed by the state" mean unless licensed by authority under the state. The state having made no provision to grant such license otherwise than is provided by the general law, by the county commissioners, the license issued by the county commissioners is the one referred to in the act. State v. Dobson, 65 N. O. 346, 347.

BY THE YEAR.

Where a parol lease was "by the year," unaccompanied by more specific words, the term "by the year" signified a lease for one year. Pleasants v. Claghorn (Pa.) 2 Miles, 302, 304.

BY TWO-THIRDS VOTE.

Authority given a school district meeting to take action "by vote," or "by a two-thirds vote," shall mean by vote, or by a two-thirds vote, in a meeting warned as provided by law. V. S. 1894, 804.

BY VIRTUE OF.

The phrase "by virtue of" means "by or through the authority of" (Cent. Dict.), and it has such meaning in Act April 5, 1889, § 1, giving a lien for labor performed or material furnished for any building or improvement under or "by virtue of" the contract with the owner, or his agent, trustee, contractor, or contractors. Bassett v. Mills, 34 S. W. 93, 94, 89 Tex. 162.

"By virtue of," as used in Rev. St. Tex. art. 3921, providing that all surveys properly made "by virtue of" valid land certificates shall be deemed valid, means capacity or power adequate to the production of a given effect. Adams v. Houston & T. C. Ry. Co., 7 S. W. 729, 741, 70 Tex. 252.

When used in bonds of a municipal corporation, which recited that said bonds were issued by virtue of a certain statute, the phrase "by virtue of" imports, as to bona fide purchasers for value, full compliance with the statute, and precludes inquiry as to whether the precedent conditions were performed before the bonds were issued. Independent School Dist. v. Stone, 1 Sup. Ct. 84, 87, 106 U. S. 183, 27 L. Ed. 90.

BY VIRTUE OF HIS EMPLOYMENT.

The phrase "trust by virtue of his employment," as used in Civ. Code, § 1985, providing that everything which an employé acquires by virtue of his employment, except his compensation, belongs to the employer, has no application to acquisitions by the employé not coming within the scope or purpose of his employment. An employé, while working for his master in grading a site for a mill on government land, found and took possession of gold. The master took the gold from him, claiming to own it because of the provisions of the statute. The gold was not found by virtue of the employment, and did not belong to the master, since the employment was not to search for gold, but to excavate and throw away earth removed. Burns v. Clark, 66 Pac. 12, 14, 133 Cal. 634, 85 Am. St. Rep. 233.

BY VIRTUE OF HIS OFFICE.

Color of office distinguished, see "Color of Office."

Acts done "virtute officii" are where they are within the authority of the officer, but in doing it he exercises that authority improperly, or abuses the confidence which the law reposes in him. Feller v. Gates, 67 Pac. 416, 417, 40 Or. 543, 56 L. R. A. 630, 91 Am. St. Rep. 492; Gerber v. Ackley, 37 Wis. 43, 44, 19 Am. Rep. 751; People v. Schuyler, 4 N. Y. (4 Comst.) 173, 187; State v. Fowler, 42 Atl. 201, 203, 88 Md. 601, 42 L. R. A. 849, 71 Am. St. Rep. 452.

The term "virtute," as in the cognate expression "virtute officii," is used to denote merely the power or authority proceeding from the employment. Burns v. Clark, 66 Pac. 12, 14, 133 Cal. 634, 85 Am. St. Rep. 233.

The phrase "by virtue of his office," as used in a bond providing that the obligor should faithfully account for and pay over all moneys received by virtue of his office, means moneys received under the law of his office, and not in violation thereof. Renfroe v. Colquitt, 74 Ga. 618, 628.

The expression "by virtue of office," and the expression "under color of office," mean very different things. "Proper fees are received by virtue of the office; extortion is under color of office." Any rightful act in office is by virtue of the office. A wrongful act in office may be under color of office; "color" meaning not the thing itself, but only the appearance thereof. Broughton v. Haywood, 61 N. C. 380, 382.

In 1 Rev. Laws, p. 155, providing that if any action on the case be brought against any sheriff concerning any matter or thing done by him by virtue of his office the action should be laid in the county where the act was done, the clause "by virtue of" means an act which is within the limits of his authority as an officer, but in the doing of which the authority is exercised improperly, or the confidence which law reposed in the officer is abused. Seeley v. Birdsall, 15 Johns. 267, 269.

Money paid to a sheriff to redeem land from a foreclosure sale is money received by him by "virtue of his office," within the meaning of Gen. St. 1878, c. 8, § 198. In re Grundysen, 53 Minn. 346, 349, 55 N. W. 557.

"Taking a security by a public officer 'virtute officii' implies that the act is lawful, either by the common law or by the authority of some statute." Burrall v. Acker (N. Y.) 23 Wend. 606, 608, 35 Am. Dec. 582.

BY VOTE.

Authority given a school district meeting to take action "by vote," or "by a two-thirds vote," shall mean by vote, or by a two-thirds vote, in a meeting warned as provided by law. V. S. 1894, 804.

Under Comp. St. c. 20, § 33, a school district was given the power by a majority vote to locate a schoolhouse. Section 54 provided that, when a district voted to have two or more schoolhouses, the district shall "by vote," or in such other manner as the legal voters present may determine, fix on the location. In construing the phrase "by vote," the court said: "The phrase 'by vote' is always construed to mean by vote of the majority, unless the express term of the act show another intent. Thus sections 40 and 46 of this chapter show that the vote to rebate taxes and to omit the names of such as are not able to pay their taxes must be by a vote of two-thirds of the voters present, while sections 37 and 43 show that the words 'by vote' mean by vote of a majority. Such is the ordinary meaning, attached by popular use to the phrase 'by vote' or 'the voters agree,' and the language of statute is to be interpreted according to common use." Bean v. Prudential Committee School Dist. No. 11, 38 Vt. 177, 178.

BY WAY OF.

The phrase "by way of" is idiomatic, and perhaps may be difficult of rendition into exact phraseology, but may be taken to mean "as for the purpose of," "in character of," "as being," and was so intended to be construed in an act providing that certain companies should pay an annual tax, for the use of the state, "by way of" a license for their corporate franchise. Act April 18, 1884, § 1. Jersey City Gaslight Co. v. United Gas Imp. Co. (U. S.) 46 Fed. 264, 266.

BY-LAW.

"In modern times the term 'by-laws' is employed to denote the private laws of corporations or other boards or bodies. Their history is briefly this: Where the Danes acquired possession of a shire in England, the township was often called a 'by,' and, as they enacted laws of their own, they were called 'by-laws' or 'town laws.'" Board of Health of City of Yonkers v. Copcutt, 24 N. Y. Supp. 625, 626, 71 Hun, 149.

Lord Coke says that a by-law or ordinance may be defined to be "the law of the inhabitants of the corporate place or district, made by themselves or the authorized body, as distinguished from the general laws of the country or the statute laws of the particular state." Hanna v. Nassau Electric R. Co., 18 App. Div. 137, 142, 45 N. Y. Supp. 437, 440.

A by-law is a subordinate law. It must not conflict with law, constitutional, statutory, or common. It must not conflict with the constitution of the corporations as found in its charter. Subject to these qualifications, a by-law is distinguishable from the charter of the corporation by the fact that it is subject to alteration. A by-law cannot destroy or impair a right, and must therefore be a reasonable exercise of the internal management of the corporation. Peck v. Elliott (U. S.) 79 Fed. 10, 14, 24 C. C. A. 425, 38 L. R. A. 616.

By-laws are rules to regulate the management of the affairs of a corporation, that it may more readily and conveniently fulfill the purposes for which it was created, and the power to make them exists at common law. They may be of general or limited duration, according to the necessity or convenience of the corporation, but must apply to all members of the corporation alike. A regulation made by directors as to the time when any particular installment of capital stock shall be paid, if applicable alike to all such subscriptions, would be, in substance and effect, a valid by-law regulating the stock of the corporation. Germania Iron Min. Co. v. King, 69 N. W. 181, 182, 94 Wis. 439, 36 L. R. A. 51.

The by-laws of a corporation are the rules adopted by it, which become its private statutes for its own government unless contrary to the laws of the land. The management of a corporation's affairs is regulated by its laws, and most frequently its directors or managers are chosen in accordance with their provisions. The by-laws are adopted in the first instance by the members of the association at a meeting where all must at least have an opportunity to be present, and when adopted they become as binding upon every member as the charter itself. A corporation may begin to live the moment its charter issues, but it may not be able to act for the purposes of its creation until those to whom the franchises are given and who make up its corporate existence have agreed how it shall act, and what it shall do, and who shall immediately direct its conduct. The agreement of the members of a corporation as to what shall be its mode of life is found in its by-laws, and their first and most important duty is to adopt them.

When by-laws have once been adopted, they become the permanent rule to govern the association's conduct. Bagley v. Reno Oil Co., 50 Atl. 760, 761, 201 Pa. 78, 56 L. R. A. 184.

The term "by-law" was originally applied to the laws and ordinances enacted by public or municipal corporation. The difference between a by-law of a private company and the law enacted by a municipality is wide and obvious. The former is merely a rule prescribed by the majority, under the authority of the other members, for the regulation and management of their joint affairs. A by-law of a municipal corporation is a local law enacted by public officers by virtue of legislative powers delegated to them by the state. A power to enact by-laws for the regulation of the business of a company does not give it any authority to regulate the private business of the stockholders. Monroe Dairy Ass'n v. Webb, 57 N. Y. Supp. 572, 574, 40 App. Div. 49.

A by-law of a corporation in respect to payment of subscriptions to stock is but a regulation between the corporation and the subscriber. Crissey v. Cook, 72 Pac. 541, 542, 67 Kan. 20.

By-laws of business corporations are, as to third persons, private regulations, binding as between the corporation and its members or third persons having knowledge of them, but of no force as limitations per se as to third persons of an authority which, except for the by-law, would be construed as within the apparent scope of the agency. Newman v. Lee, 84 N. Y. Supp. 106, 108, 87 App. Div. 116.

Acts 1847, c. 166, authorizes towns to make all by-laws that may be necessary to preserve the peace, good order, and internal police therein, and to annex suitable penalties, etc. In passing upon the meaning of the phrase "pass by-laws," in determining the question whether or not a town was authorized by that phrase to prohibit the sale, by any person not duly licensed, of intoxicating liquor, the court says: "The power is given in general words, but the words are so general as to indicate that some restriction as to reasonable limits was in the mind of the Legislature, and that such restriction intended to apply, with a just regard to the objects to be attained, and the subject-matter on which it was to operate; that is, the power conferred was to be limited to such objects as are usually sought and obtained by municipal by-laws. It was further said that the fact that the Legislature used the term "by-laws," and gave the power to make by-laws, showed that they did not intend to give an unlimited power; the term by-laws having a peculiar and limited signification, being used to designate the orders and regulations which a corporation, as one of its legal incidents, has power to make, and which is usually exercised to regulate its own actions and concerns, and the rights and duties of its members amongst themselves. This has been somewhat extended in the case of municipal and other quasi corporations, but a broad distinction has always been made between the authority of a corporation to make by-laws and the general power of making laws. Had the Legislature intended to grant to the town the power to pass the regulation mentioned, it would have used the term "laws," and not "by-laws." Commonwealth v. Turner, 55 Mass. (1 Cush.) 493, 495.

Gen. Laws, p. 896, declares that, on the passage or adoption of every by-law or ordinance to enter into contract by any council or board of trustees of any municipal corporation, the ayes and nays shall be called and recorded, and that a concurrence of a majority of all members elected shall be required. Held, that the words "by-law or ordinance" are employed in a general sense, and comprehend all by-laws and ordinances which shall be adopted by the corporation. Tracey v. People, 6 Colo. 151, 153.

Law imposing penalty.

The term "by-law" has a peculiar and limited signification, and is used to designate the orders and regulations which a corporation, as one of its legal incidents, has power to make, and which is usually exercised to regulate its own action and concerns, and the rights and duties of its members amongst themselves. This has been somewhat extended in the case of municipal and other quasi corporations, but there is a distinction between the authority of a corporation to make by-laws and the general power of making laws, and, as used in an act authorizing towns to make by-laws necessary to preserve the peace, does not authorize such towns to make laws imposing penalties on all persons for selling intoxicating liquors without a license. Commonwealth v. Turner, 55 Mass. (1 Cush.) 493, 496.

Ordinance synonymous.

A by-law is a law made by a municipality for the regulation of affairs within its authority; an ordinance. Century Digest. In general and professional use, the term "ordinance" is almost, if not quite, equivalent in meaning to the term "by-law," and is the word most generally used to denote the by-laws adopted by municipal corporations. So that an ordinance granting a franchise is a by-law of a general or permanent nature, within Code 1873, § 492, requiring publication of such by-laws, and providing that they shall take effect and be in force at the expiration of five days after they had been published. State v. Omaha & C. B. Ry. & Bridge Co., 84 N. W. 983, 984, 113 Iowa, 30, 52 L. R. A. 315, 86 Am. St. Rep. 357. See, also, Nat. Bank of Commerce v. Town of Grenada (U. S.) 44 Fed. 262, 263.

The word "ordinance," as applied to cities, shall be synonymous with the word "by-law." Rev. Laws Mass. 1902, p. 89, c. 9, § 5, subd. 15.

The terms "ordinances," "rules," "regulations," and "by-laws" are all equivalent to the term "ordinance." Taylor v. City of Lambertville, 10 Atl. 809, 811, 43 N. J. Eq. (16 Stew.) 107; Hunt v. Common Council of City of Lambertville, 45 N. J. Law (16 Vroom) 279, 282.

Regulation distinguished.

A by-law of an incorporated company differs from a regulation, in this: that the validity of the former is a judicial question, while that of the latter is matter in pais. Compton v. Van Volkenburgh, 34 N. J. Law (5 Vroom) 134, 135.

Resolution distinguished.

A by-law is a permanent rule of action, in accordance with which the corporate affairs are to be conducted. A by-law differs from a resolution, in that a resolution applies to a single act of the corporation, while a by-law is a permanent and continuing rule, which is to be applied to all future occasions, so that, where a resolution was passed by the directors of a corporation, it was sufficient to authorize the act, without a by-law being passed for such purpose. Steger v. Davis, 27 S. W. 1068, 1070, 8 Tex. Civ. App. 23.

"A by-law is a rule or law of a corporation for its government. It is an act of legislation, and the solemnities and sanction required by the charter for its passage must be observed. A by-law may be in the form of a resolution and require the same solemnities to pass it, but a resolution is not necessarily a by-law." Drake v. Hudson R. R. Co., 7 Barb. 508, 539.

Hill's Ann. Laws Or. 1887, § 3221, subd. 6, providing that corporations may make by-laws for the sale of stock for unpaid assessments, means by-laws which are general, affecting every delinquent subscriber and all delinquent stock, and a resolution which is merely directed against the stock or interest of a particular stockholder, is not a by-law. Budd v. Multnomah St. Ry. Co., 15 Pac. 659, 662, 15 Or. 413, 3 Am. St. Rep. 169.

Statute distinguished.

The terms "by-laws," "ordinances," and "municipal regulations" have substantially the same meaning, and are the laws of the corporate district made by the authorized body, in distinction from the general laws of the state. They are local regulations for the government of the inhabitants of the particular place. They are not laws in the legal sense, though binding on the community affected. They are not prescribed by the supreme power of the state, from which alone a law can emanate, and therefore cannot be statutes which are the written will of the Legislature, expressed in the form necessary to constitute parts of the law. Rutherford v. Swink, 35 S. W. 554, 555, 98 Tenn. (12 Pickle) 564.

BYROAD.

A byroad is one which individuals who live some distance from a public road in a newly settled country make in going to the nearest public road—that is, it is a road which is used by the inhabitants, but is not laid out—and very often it is called a “driftway,” and is a road of necessity in newly settled countries. Van Blarcon v. Frike, 29 N. J. Law (8 Dutch.) 516, 517.

As private road.

A byroad is an unfrequented path or obscure road. As used in a legislative enactment authorizing owners of land to construct swinging gates across private and by roads, it means every road which does not come within the description of public roads. Stevens v. Allen, 29 N. J. Law (5 Dutch.) 68, 71.

In a statute providing that, if any byroad heretofore used as such by the inhabitants shall be shut up or rendered impassable, the person so aggrieved may institute proceedings to open it, the term “byroad” means a private, unfrequented, or obscure road, and is used in opposition to a private road laid out according to law. Perrine v. Farr, 22 N. J. Law (2 Zab.) 356, 372.

As public road.

The way connecting two public roads which the public, as well as the owner of land thereon, had used to pass from one of the public thoroughfares to the other, and to the farm of such person, for over 50 years, may properly be designated as a byroad. Clement v. Bettie, 48 Atl. 567, 65 N. J. Law, 675.

As its name imports, a byroad is an obscure or neighborhood road, in its earlier existence not used to any great extent by the public, yet so far a public road that the public have right of free access to it at all times. To constitute such road, the land occupied by it must have been given up or dedicated by its owner for the purpose of a byroad to all who may wish to enjoy it. Wood v. Hurd, 34 N. J. Law (5 Vroom) 87, 89; Yeomans v. Ridgewood Tp., 46 N. J. Law (17 Vroom) 508, 509.

BYSTANDER.

The term “bystanders,” as used in statutes allowing or requiring talesmen to be taken from the bystanders, means only those who are actually present in court. Phillips v. Gratz (Pa.) 2 Pen. & W. 412, 417, 23 Am. Dec. 33. Persons who have been in attendance on the session of the court as bystanders. Savage v. State, 18 Fla. 909, 952.

A statute permitting a sheriff to select talesmen from “bystanders or others” did not mean such as were accidentally in attendance on the court, but might well include persons whose presence the sheriff had taken previous means to obtain. Patterson v. State, 4 Atl. 449, 452, 48 N. J. Law (19 Vroom) 381.

A bystander is one who stands near; one who has no concern with the business transacted. As used in Rev. St. 1889, § 2170, providing that, where the judge refuses to allow a bill of exceptions, it may be signed by three bystanders, it does not include an attorney connected with the trial of the cause in which the bill is filed. State v. Jones, 14 S. W. 946, 947, 102 Mo. 305.

C

C. A. F.

"C. a. f." is a term well understood in the meat trade, meaning cost and freight. Pepper v. Western Union Telegraph Co., 11 S. W. 783, 87 Tenn. (3 Pickle) 554, 4 L. R. A. 660, 10 Am. St. Rep. 699.

C., B. & Q. R. R. CO.

The letters "C., B. & Q. R. R. Co.," in a petition in proceedings to take depositions to perpetuate testimony, which gives defendant's name as C., B. & Q. R. R. Co., and states that plaintiff expects to bring an action against such defendant, is not a sufficient designation of the defendant, as judicial notice cannot be taken that these letters stand for the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad Company. Accola v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co., 30 N. W. 503, 504, 70 Iowa, 185.

C.—CT.—CTS.

The abbreviations "c." and "ct." stand for cents. Hunt v. Smith, 9 Kan. 137, 153.

The abbreviations "c.," "ct.," and "cts." stand for cent or cents, and, at the head of a column, sufficiently indicate the character of the figures below. Jackson v. Cummings, 15 Ill. (5 Peck) 449, 453.

The abbreviation "cts." means cents, and, when used at the top of columns of figures in an assessment roll, is sufficient information that the figures under the same were so many cents. Linck v. City of Litchfield, 31 N. E. 123, 126, 141 Ill. 469.

The letters "cts." in an indictment have been construed as an abbreviation for the word "cents," and there is no variance, although the word "cents" is written out in the instrument described in the indictment and offered in evidence. Barnett v. State, 54 Ala. 579, 583.

The usual marks expressive of dollars and cents, when employed according to general and long practice, as in stating accounts and the like, may be treated as part of our language by adoption and use, but are not a part of the English language, within the meaning of the statute requiring declarations and other pleadings to be drawn in the English language. Clark v. Stoughton, 18 Vt. 50, 51, 44 Am. Dec. 361.

C. L. R. P. OATS.

Where a memorandum was for the delivery of a certain number of C. L. R. P. oats, such term was an abbreviation for "car loads of Texas rust proof oats." Wilson v. Coleman, 6 S. E. 693, 694, 81 Ga. 297.

C. O. D.As collect on delivery.

"C. O. D." means collect on delivery. American Exp. Co. v. Wettstein, 28 Ill. App. 96, 100; The Illinois (U. S.) 12 Fed. Cas. 1178, 1190.

"C. O. D." are the initial letters of the words "collect on delivery," and, when used in an express receipt, are a direction to collect the amount named of the ultimate consignee on the delivery of the goods to him by the last carrier. Collender v. Dinsmore, 55 N. Y. 200, 206, 14 Am. Rep. 224.

"C. O. D." is an abbreviation used in the express business, which means collect on delivery, or, more fully stated, deliver upon payment of the charges due the seller for the price, and the carrier for the carriage, of the goods. State v. Intoxicating Liquors, 73 Me. 278, 279; State v. O'Neill, 58 Vt. 140, 158, 2 Atl. 586, 56 Am. Rep. 557.

The letters "C. O. D.," as used in connection with a package sent by express, mean that the express company shall collect, on delivery, the price of the goods and the cost of the transportation from the consignee. Adams Exp. Co. v. McConnell, 27 Kan. 238, 240.

Judicial notice.

The initials "C. O. D.," as used by carriers, mean collect on delivery, or, more fully stated, deliver on the payment of the charges due the seller for the price, and the carrier for the carriage, of the goods. These initials have acquired a fixed and determinate meaning, which courts and juries may recognize from general information. State v. Intoxicating Liquors, 73 Me. 278, 279 (cited in State v. Carl, 43 Ark. 353, 360, 51 Am. Rep. 565).

"C. O. D." is an abbreviation meaning collect on delivery, of which fact the court will take judicial notice, so that parol evidence of the meaning of the abbreviation is not necessary or admissible. Sheffield Furnace Co. v. Hull Coal & Coke Co., 14 South. 672, 681, 101 Ala. 446.

The meaning of the abbreviation "C. O. D.," as used by expressmen, is not a matter of such common knowledge that a court can take judicial notice of it, but its meaning is for the jury. McNichol v. Pacific Exp. Co., 12 Mo. App. 401, 407.

As part of contract of shipment.

"C. O. D." are the first letters of the words "collect on delivery," and, where goods intrusted to a common carrier are marked "C. O. D.," the contract of the carrier in connection therewith is not only for the safe carriage and delivery of the goods to the consignee, but, further, that he will collect on delivery, and return to the consignor, the charges on such goods. United States Exp. Co. v. Keefer, 59 Ind. 263, 267.

"C. O. D." are the initial letters of the words "collect on delivery," and mean that an express company or other common carrier, in addition to its engagement to carry goods, shall deliver them to the consignee only after first receiving from him the amount of money marked on the box, and will deliver the money to the consignor. American Exp. Co. v. Lesem, 39 Ill. 312, 333; Rathbun v. Citizens' Steamboat Co., 1 City Ct. R. 107.

"C. O. D." placed on a package committed to a carrier is an order to the carrier to collect the money for the package at the time of its delivery. It is a part of the undertaking of the carrier with the consignor, a violation of which imposes on the carrier the obligation to pay the price of the article delivered. Fleming v. Commonwealth, 18 Atl. 622, 623, 130 Pa. 138, 5 L. R. A. 470, 17 Am. St. Rep. 763.

The letters "C. O. D.," marked on goods transported by an express company, are not of themselves sufficient evidence of an agreement that the company is to collect the price for the goods when sold. American Merchants' Union Exp. Co. v. Wolf, 79 Ill. 430, 434.

As affecting sale.

A "collect on delivery" sale is one where the seller delivers the goods to a carrier with instructions to deliver the goods on condition that the buyer pay the carrier the price named and agreed on. When goods are so forwarded, and marked "C. O. D.," the carrier is the agent of the purchaser to receive the goods from the seller, and the agent of the seller to collect the price from the purchaser. The sale is therefore complete when the goods are delivered to the carrier. Pilgreen v. State, 71 Ala. 368.

Where the sellers of goods send them to the purchaser by an express company, directing the company to collect on delivery, such phrase imports that payment and delivery were to be simultaneous acts, and hence, until such payment and delivery, the title remained in the vendor. Baker v. Bourcicault, 1 Daly, 23, 27.

"C. O. D." means collect on delivery, and shows an intention not to give credit. Its purpose is to retain control of the goods by the shipper, and thereby secure himself against possible default of the consignee. Wagner v. Hallack, 3 Colo. 176, 184.

As relating to transportation charges.

"C. O. D." are the initial letters of the words "collect on delivery," and, when placed on a package shipped by express, mean that the value or price of the package, marked thereon, will be collected on delivery and transmitted to the consignor. The letters have nothing to do with the transportation charges on the package. American Merchants' Union Exp. Co. v. Schler, 55 Ill. 140, 141.

CABIN.

"Cabin," as used in a court record showing that a plaintiff recovered final judgment for the premises sued for, "to wit, a certain cabin standing and being upon the southwest quarter," etc., includes the land occupied by the cabin, as well as the cabin superstructure. Harvie v. Turner, 46 Mo. 444, 447.

Of vessel.

The cabin of a vessel includes both the part used as a dining room and that used as a sitting room, as well as the staterooms connected with each part. Leckie v. Sears, 109 Mass. 429, 430.

CABINET.

A "cabinet" is defined by Worcester to be a set of boxes or drawers for curiosities; any place in which things of value are hidden; a closet; a small room. The word is used in Tariff Act Oct. 1, 1890, par. 524, reciting that the term "antiquities," as used in such act, shall include only such articles as are suitable for souvenirs or cabinet collections, in either of the significations given by Worcester. In re Glaenzer (U. S.) 67 Fed. 532, 533.

A bequest of "my cabinet or collection of curiosities consisting of coins, medals, gems, oriental stones and other valuable things," does not include ornaments of the person, such as diamonds and pearls made up for wear, though they were occasionally shown with it. Cavendish v. Cavendish, 1 Brown, Ch. 467.

CABINET AND MAHOGANY DOOR MAKER.

A cabinet and mahogany door maker, within the meaning of a contract by which defendant agrees to teach plaintiff the business of cabinet and mahogany door making, cannot be construed as requiring defendant to teach the plaintiff the business of cabinet-making, but only the business of cabinet door making and mahogany door making. Stroud v. Frith, 11 Barb. 300, 302.

CABINET WARE.

"Cabinet ware," as used in a fire policy insuring cabinet ware, meant articles in finished state, and hence such articles in process of manufacture were not covered by the policy. Appleby v. Astor Fire Ins. Co., 54 N. Y. 253, 259.

CABLE SYSTEM.

The cable system, with reference to street railways, is generally understood to imply a stationary engine and an underground cable. Hooper v. Baltimore City Pass. Ry. Co., 37 Atl. 359, 361, 85 Md. 509, 38 L. R. A. 509.

CABRON.

A man who consents to his wife's prostitution. Escareno v. State, 16 Tex. App. 85, 90.

CADASTRE.

"Cadastre," in Spanish law, is an official statement of the quality and value of real property in any district, made for the purpose of justly apportioning the taxes payable on such property. Strother v. Lucas, 37 U. S. (12 Pet.) 410, 428, 9 L. Ed. 1137.

CADAVER.

As property, see "Property."

The word "cadaver," which is used by Lord C  ke in the maxim that "cadaver nullius in bonis," is now an English as well as a Latin word. Webster and other lexicographers say it is a dead human body; a corpse. Griffith v. Charlotte, C. & A. R. Co., 23 S. C. 25, 32, 55 Am. Rep. 1.

CADET.

Cadets at West Point, by long and settled usage, having the force of law, are appointed by a certificate under the hand and seal of the Secretary of War. They are neither commissioned officers, nor common soldiers, nor noncommissioned officers, but are inferior officers, and, for purposes of instruction, may be required to serve as officers, noncommissioned officers, or privates. Babbitt v. United States, 16 Ct. Cl. 202, 211.

Cadets serving at West Point are part of the army. A person serving as such is serving in the army, and the time during which he is so serving is a part of the actual time of service by him in the army. United States v. Morton, 5 Sup. Ct. 1, 2, 112 U. S. 1, 28 L. Ed. 618.

CADET ENGINEERS.

The term "cadet engineers," when applied to the members of the Naval Academy, means that class who are studying to be naval constructors or steam engineers. United States v. Redgrave, 6 Sup. Ct. 444, 447, 116 U. S. 474, 29 L. Ed. 697.

CALCIFICATION.

"Calcification" is a term used with reference to arteries, and means a deposit of lime salts in the walls of the tube, making it rigid and fragile, instead of elastic, as it is in health. It was held, in connection with other diseases, to render false a representation as to health in an application for insurance. Commercial Travelers' Mut. Acc. Ass'n v. Fulton (U. S.) 79 Fed. 423, 424, 24 C. C. A. 654.

CALCINED MAGNESIA.

Calcined magnesia is a preparation of magnesia made from sulphate of magnesia and bicarbonate of soda, calcined by heat, and is a medicinal preparation, within Rev. St. § 2504, Schedule M, p. 480 (2d Ed.), fixing the rate of import duty upon pills, powders, tinctures, etc., or other medicinal preparations recommended to the public as proprietary medicines, or prepared according to some private formula or secret art as remedies. Ferguson v. Arthur, 6 Sup. Ct. 861, 864, 117 U. S. 482, 29 L. Ed. 979.

CALC-SPAR.

Calc-spar is crystallized carbonate of lime, being caused by the dissolution of the original solid limerock, which is carried into every accessible cavity or fissure, and crystallizes in coarse crystals, filling the cavity, and is called "spar." It is necessarily of comparatively recent formation, and, where a seam of it is found cutting across the country, with ore contiguous to it on either side, the plain and inevitable inference is that at some epoch subsequent to the deposit of the body of ore a fissure occurred, which in process of time has been filled with the spar. Its existence is no impeachment of the identity of the bodies of ore in which it occurs, and does not constitute a division between lodes in general. Phillipotts v. Blasdel, 8 Nev. 61, 71.

CALCULATE—CALCULATED.

"Calculate" means to compute or reckon. Oakes v. Mitchell, 15 Me. (3 Shep.) 360, 362.

As adapted.

The word "calculated" has been defined to mean suited or adapted to by design. Gerrish v. Norris, 63 Mass. (9 Cush.) 167, 170.

"Calculated," as used in an instruction authorizing the jury, in a prosecution for murder, to convict if they believed defendant willfully struck another with a pistol that was a deadly weapon, or "calculated" to produce death, was not equivalent to "intended," so as to render the instruction erroneous, but was synonymous with "adapted," "fitted," or "suited." Smallwood v. Commonwealth (Ky.) 40 S. W. 248.

As intended.

"Calculate" primarily means to compute mathematically. It implies the power to think, to study, and to reason. It is usually applied to sentient beings—those having the faculty of sensation; the power to perceive, reason, and think. As a provincialism, it is sometimes used in the sense of to intend, to design, to plan, or to propose. The word, in an action for personal injuries, which charged that a certain act of the defendant was well calculated to, and did, frighten plaintiff's horse, was construed to have been used in the latter sense. Keeley Brewing Co. v. Parnin, 41 N. E. 471, 473, 13 Ind. App. 588; Oakes v. Mitchell, 15 Me. (3 Shep.) 360, 362.

CALENDAR.

The word "calendar" originates from the verb "calare." "Calendar" means a division of time in years, months, weeks, and days, and a register of them. Rives v. Guthrie, 46 N. C. 84, 86.

The ordinary signification of the word "calendar" is a list or enumeration of causes arranged for trial in court. Titely v. Kaehler, 9 Ill. App. (9 Bradw.) 537, 539.

The word "calendar" may or may not be synonymous with the statutory word "docket." Its ordinary signification is a list or enumeration of causes arranged for trial in the court, but there is nothing in the word from which it can be determined how such list is to be made up, or upon what principle the various causes are arranged thereon. Titely v. Kaehler, 9 Ill. App. (9 Bradw.) 537, 539.

CALENDAR MONTH.

A calendar month is a month as designated in the calendar, without regard to the number of days it may contain. In commercial transactions it means a month ending on the day in the succeeding month corresponding to the day in the preceding month from which the computation began, and, if the last month have not so many days, then on the last day of that month. Daley v. Anderson, 48 Pac. 839, 840, 7 Wyo. 1, 75 Am. St. Rep. 870 (citing Migotti v. Colvill, 4 C. P. Div. 233).

The term "calendar month," in a statute providing that charitable bequests shall be void unless executed at least one calendar month before the decease of the testator, means a month according to the calendar or almanac, which is not uniform as a lunar month, but varies. Thus a will executed on February 27, 1883, by a testator who died March 28, 1883, was executed one calendar month prior to testator's death. In re Parker's Estate, 14 Wkly. Notes Cas. 566.

CALENDAR YEAR.

The calendar year is composed of 12 months, varying in length according to the common or Gregorian calendar. In re Parker's Estate, 14 Wkly. Notes Cas. 566.

CALENDs.

The calendar of the Romans had a peculiar arrangement. They gave particular names to three days of the month. The first was called the "calends." In the four months of March, May, July, and October, the seventh day was called "nones," and in the four former the fifteenth days were called "ides," and in the last the thirteenth were thus called. Rives v. Guthrie, 46 N. C. 84, 87.

CALF.

Under Code, § 3072, providing that two cows and a calf shall be exempt from execution, the term "calf" does not include a yearling heifer. Mitchell v. Joyce, 28 N. W. 473, 474, 69 Iowa, 121.

The term "calves," as used in Revenue Act, § 4, imposing a tax on cows and calves, does not include heifers and steers which are over one year of age. Milligan v. Jefferson County, 2 Mont. 543, 546.

CALL.

See "On Call."

A call is the privilege of calling for, or not calling for, the thing bought. Minnesota Lumber Co. v. Whitebreast Coal Co., 160 Ill. 85, 97, 43 N. E. 774, 778, 81 L. R. A. 529.

For stock subscriptions.

In a subscription for shares of stock in a corporation, providing that the stockholders were to pay for their shares on call by the company, "call" meant merely a step in the process of collection; and where a company, becoming insolvent, abandoned all action under its charter, the original mode of making calls upon the stockholders cannot be pursued, and the debt, therefore, as between the debtor and creditor of a corporation, must be treated as due, without further demand. Hatch v. Dana, 101 U. S. 205, 215, 25 L. Ed. 885.

Call, as used in the corporation statutes in reference to calls on corporation stock, is synonymous with the word "assessments," as used in such statutes. Stewart v. Walla Walla Printing & Pub. Co., 20 Pac. 605, 606, 1 Wash. St. 521.

"Call," as used with reference to the power of a company of making calls, is capable of three meanings. They either mean the resolution, or its notification, or the time when it becomes payable. It must mean one of these three. Ambergate, N. & B. & E. J. Ry. Co. v. Mitchell, 4 Exch. 540, 543.

A call is an assessment made by corporation, or the directors thereof, on the subscriptions for shares, within the amount of the unpaid sums on the number of shares subscribed. Santa Cruz R. Co. v. Spreckles, 3 Pac. 661, 663, 65 Cal. 193.

The terms "calls"—on unpaid subscription to capital stock—and "assessments" are used interchangeably in our statutes. Stewart v. Walla Walla Printing & Pub. Co., 1 Wash. St. 521, 522, 20 Pac. 605.

A "call," as used in relation to corporations, is an official declaration by the directors that the sum subscribed, or any specified installment thereof, is required to be paid. Germania Iron Min. Co. v. King, 69 N. W. 181, 182, 94 Wis. 439, 36 L. R. A. 51; Brad-dock v. Philadelphia, M. & M. R. Co., 45 N. J. Law (16 Vroom) 363, 365; American Alkali Co. v. Campbell (U. S.) 113 Fed. 398, 400.

In descriptions of land.

The general or descriptive call in entries of the description of lands is such as calls for objects possessing such notoriety in themselves, or so particularly described, that attention is directed to the neighborhood of the land. Stockton v. Morris, 19 S. E. 531, 533, 39 W. Va. 432.

A particular or locative call is one which contains a reference to objects which more specifically describe or locate the land entered than those referred to in a general call. Stockton v. Morris, 19 S. E. 531, 534, 39 W. Va. 432.

In Bouvier's Law Dictionary, the word "call" is defined thus: "In American land law, the designations in an entry, patent, or grant of land of visible natural objects as limits to the boundary." And Webster defines the word as a reference to or statement of an object, course, distance, or other matter of description in a survey or grant requiring or calling for a corresponding object, etc., on the land. The meaning of "calling" for a corner or boundary is well understood in the law. It is necessarily applicable to written instruments, such as entries, surveys, patents, grants, and deeds. King v. Watkins (U. S.) 98 Fed. 913, 922.

In stock exchange.

A call memorandum or writing, executed for a valuable consideration, giving the bearer the right to call upon the subscriber for certain shares of stock therein named within a stated time, and at a given price, is not an agreement to sell such stock, within the meaning of section 25 of the war revenue act of 1898, and is not subject to the stamp tax imposed on such agreements. Such instrument merely gives an option, requiring a further agreement to effect a sale. White v. Treat (U. S.) 100 Fed. 290, 291.

Within the peculiar language of dealers in stocks and options, a call is defined to be the privilege of calling for or not calling for the thing bought, as distinguished from "put," which is the privilege of delivering or not delivering the thing sold. Minnesota Lumber Co. v. Whitebreast Coal Co., 43 N. E. 774, 778, 160 Ill. 85, 31 L. R. A. 529.

Within the peculiar language of persons dealing in optional contracts, a call is the privilege of calling for or not calling for the thing bought, and is simply a mode adopted for speculating in difference in market values of grain or other commodities. Osgood v. Bauder, 39 N. W. 887, 890, 75 Iowa, 550, 1 L. R. A. 655; Pixley v. Boynton, 79 Ill. 351, 353; White v. Barber, 8 Sup. Ct. 221, 230, 123 U. S. 392, 31 L. Ed. 243; Pearce v. Foote, 113 Ill. (1 Peck) 228, 234, 55 Am. Rep. 414; Miller v. Bensley, 20 Ill. App. (20 Bradw.) 528, 530.

Of a meeting.

The call of a meeting of a county board, in the legal sense of the term, is a summons to the parties entitled to meet, directing them to meet. It involves something more than a mere purpose in the mind of the caller, or an expression of that purpose unheard, unseen, and unknown. It implies a communication of that purpose to the parties to be affected. In some way or other, notice must be given; and, if there be no regulation as to the manner of notice, it must be personal, at least where personal notice is practicable. Paola & F. R. Ry. Co. v. Anderson County Com'rs, 16 Kan. 302, 307.

Of a minister to church.

A call is an instrument issuing from the congregation of a church to a minister to become its pastor, which may be signed either by the elders and deacons, by the trustees, or by a select committee, and attested by the moderator of the meeting. It is an instrument of a purely ecclesiastical character, having relation to the spiritual concerns of the church, rather than to its temporal affairs, purporting on its face to be the act of the congregation; and, being put forth, accepted, and relied upon as such, it is an act of the congregation, and not of the persons signing it. Paddock v. Brown, 6 Hill, 530, 532.

CALL AT.

Liberty to call at or to enter or touch at, certain ports, when given in a marine policy, imports that such liberty is based upon a purpose to be accomplished by entering such ports, which is to be inferred from the character of the voyage, and by the cargo and the circumstances and nature of the adventure; and a reasonable delay at the authorized port to accomplish such purpose is not a deviation. Arnold v. Pacific Mut. Ins. Co., 78 N. Y. 7, 16.

Where a bill of lading authorized a vessel to call at any port or ports whatsoever, such provision did not include or give her authority to put into a port of refuge, where such act was necessary by reason of the ship's failure to load an adequate cargo of coal for the voyage, so as to entitle her to charge the loss of cargo, etc., consumed by reason of such negligence, as a general average charge. Hurlbut v. Turnure (U. S.) 81 Fed. 208, 211, 26 C. C. A. 335.

CALL DEPOSITS.

In banking circles, deposits are often qualified or distinguished as time and call deposits. The former is for a specified time, and the latter is subject to call at the pleasure of the depositor. State v. Cadwell, 44 N. W. 700, 701, 79 Iowa, 432.

CALLED.

An indictment against one for gaming, which charges him with betting at a game called "pool" instead of at a game of pool, is sufficient. Thompson v. State (Tex.) 28 S. W. 684.

CALLED FOR TRIAL.

See "Regularly Called for Trial."

By the term "called for trial" is meant the stage of the case where both parties have announced that they are ready, or when a continuance, having been applied for, has been denied. Code Cr. Proc. Tex. 1895, art. 641; McGrew v. State, 31 Tex. Cr. R. 336, 20 S. W. 740; Shaw v. State, 17 Tex. App. 225.

Rev. St. Wis. § 2478, providing that one desiring a jury trial shall demand a jury at the time the action is "called for trial," means that the party must demand a jury when the action is called for trial on a particular day, but does not mean that a jury must not be demanded at the mere opening of the court on the first day of the term, for the purpose of ascertaining, in a general way, what cases are for trial at the term. State v. Clark, 30 N. W. 122, 125, 67 Wis. 229.

Calling a case for trial is an announcement or declaration by the court that the case has been reached in its order, and that the judicial examination of the issues of law and fact upon which the decision of the case depends is about to begin. Moore v. Sargent, 14 N. E. 466, 468, 112 Ind. 484.

CALLED FORTH.

There is a sound distinction between the calling forth of the militia, and their being in actual service and employment of the United States, contemplated both in the Constitution and the acts of Congress. The Constitution enables Congress to provide for the government of such part of the militia as may be employed in the service of the United States, and makes the President commander in chief of the militia when called into the actual service of the United States. If the former clause included the authority to call forth the militia, as being, in virtue of the call of the President, in actual service, there would certainly be no necessity for the distinct clause authorizing it to provide for the calling forth of the militia, and the President would be commander in chief not merely of the militia in actual service, but of the militia ordered into service. The term "actual service" means something more than a mere calling forth of the militia. It includes some act of organization, mustering, or marching done or recognized in obedience to the call in the public service. The terms "called forth" and "employed in the service" cannot, in any appropriate sense, be said to be synonymous. From the very nature of things, the call must precede the service. Houston v. Moore, 18 U. S. (5 Wheat.) 1, 64, 5 L. Ed. 19.

CALLED ON.

The clause "called upon to pay," as used in a contract wherein certain stockholders of a corporation agreed to indemnify all those who became indorsers of the company's paper, for the sums they were called upon to pay, is equivalent to "compelled or required to pay." Taylor v. Coon, 48 N. W. 123, 128, 79 Wis. 76.

"Called upon," as used in a guaranty that, if plaintiff should be called upon to pay certain rent, the guarantor would repay on demand, has reference to the legal obligation to pay, so that, unless plaintiff was legally bound to pay, the defendant is not liable on his guaranty. H. Koehler & Co. v. Reinheimer, 45 N. Y. Supp. 337, 338, 20 Misc. Rep. 62.

Within a statute entitling persons to vote in a parish on certain occupancy, and where they had been called upon to pay certain rates, a tenant was called upon to pay where he occupied under an agreement with the landlord that he should pay all rates and taxes, and the landlord had called upon the tenant to pay, and he had paid, and the landlord, in turn, had paid the rates according to the stipulation. Cook v. Luckett, 2 C. B. 168, 173.

CALLING.

See "Ordinary Calling"; "Unlawful Calling."

Secular calling, see "Secular Business."

A calling is defined to be usual occupation, profession, or employment; vocation; so that a lot used by a gardener for the cultivation of produce, and separated from his dwelling by streets, is exempt as a homestead, under Const. 1876, art. 16, § 51, declaring that the homestead in a city shall consist of a lot or lots not to exceed a certain value, used as a place to exercise the calling or business of the head of the family. Waggen-er v. Haskell, 35 S. W. 1, 2, 89 Tex. 435.

In Laws N. Y. 1892, c. 602, requiring any person intending to conduct the trade, business, or calling of a plumber, etc., to submit to examination before engaging in the business, etc., the terms "trade, business, or calling" are synonymous, and have relation to the mechanical employments; one's trade, etc., being that business which he has learned and fitted himself to follow. People v. Warden of City Prison, 39 N. E. 686, 689, 144 N. Y. 520, 27 L. R. A. 718.

CALLING THE DOCKET.

Calling a list or docket is the public calling of the docket at the commencement of each term of court for the purpose of disposing of the same with regard to setting a time for trial, entering an order for a continuance, default, nonsuit, or some other disposition of the case. Blanchard v. Ferdinand, 132 Mass. 389, 391.

CALUMNY.

In the civil law "calumny" signified an unjust prosecution or defense of a suit, and the phrase is still so used in the courts of Scotland and in the ecclesiastical and admiralty courts of England. Lanning v. Christy, 30 Ohio St. 115, 117, 27 Am. Rep. 431.

CAMPHENE.

Camphene is turpentine purified by repeated distillation. Putnam v. Commonwealth Ins. Co. (U. S.) 4 Fed. 753.

It cannot be said, as a matter of law, that the words "camphene" or "spirit gas," within the meaning of a fire policy prohibiting the lighting of the insured premises with camphene or spirit gas, includes burning fluid. Stettiner v. Granite Ins. Co., 12 N. Y. Super. Ct. (5 Duer) 594, 596.

CAMP HUNTING.

"Camp hunting," which is prohibited by Act Feb. 11, 1897, is defined by the statute to mean persons camping in the woods, or at or near any house, with guns and dogs, for the purpose of hunting game, etc. Du Bose v. State, 74 S. W. 292, 293, 71 Ark. 347.

CAMP MEETING.

A "camp meeting" is universally understood to be a religious meeting, so that charging a person with being intoxicated at a camp meeting and creating a disturbance is equivalent to charging her with disturbing a religious meeting, and slanderous per se. Thomas v. Smith, 27 N. Y. Supp. 589, 591, 75 Hun, 573.

The term "camp meeting" means a religious meeting, and hence an allegation in a criminal complaint charging the wrongful sale of liquors within one mile of the place of holding the camp meeting is a sufficient allegation of the violation of a statute prohibiting such sales. State v. Read, 12 R. I. 135, 137.

St. 1867, c. 59, prohibited persons, during the time of holding a camp meeting or field meeting for religious purposes, from maintaining a building for furnishing provisions or refreshments without permission from the authorities or officers having charge or direction of the meeting, it was held that "Camp meeting" means "any meeting held in the open air for periods of some days in succession, and designed largely, among other purposes, to attract those who do not attend or attend irregularly stated places of public worship, to induce them to listen to religious instruction, and thus awaken in them a religious interest"; and, in order to receive the protection of the law, such meeting need not be the result of an organization or of an organized body, but any camp or field meeting, however informally arranged, is within the statute. Commonwealth v. Bearse, 132 Mass. 542, 547, 42 Am. Rep. 450.

Wag. St. 504, § 30, providing that every person who shall disturb any "camp meeting, congregation or other assembly of people met for religious worship" shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, means a particular piece of ground set apart for the purpose of such meeting, and houses which are used for public worship, but does not apply to a religious meeting held in a public square. State v. Schleneman, 64 Mo. 386, 387.

Act 1809, pp. 49, 50, prohibiting the retailing of liquors within one mile of a place set apart for the worship of Almighty God, should be construed to include a camp meeting. State v. Hall (S. C.) 2 Bailey, 151.

CAN.

See "As Soon as Can Be"; "As Speedily as Can Be"; "Best He Can"; "Could."

As is competent.

The word "can," as used in Code Ga. § 2414, relating to the execution and attestation of wills, and making all persons competent witnesses to the same who "can swear" to their signature, refers to the question of ability to swear, not to recollection or accuracy of vision, but to legal capacity to testify. Synonymous with the word "can," in the connection in which it is used in this statute, are the expressions "is able to," "is competent to," "has the capacity to," or, negatively speaking, "is not unable to," "has not the lack of power to," "has not the inability to," "is not incompetent to," "lacks not the capacity to"; and it is unreasonable, if not absurd, to construe the words "can swear" as meaning that the witness must have the requisite memory and the keen physical perception which would enable him, after the lapse of weeks, months, and years, to distinguish and identify a mere cross-mark or other ordinary device representing his signature. Gillis v. Gillis, 23 S. E. 107, 110, 96 Ga. 1, 30 L. R. A. 143, 51 Am. St. Rep. 121.

As is possible.

"Can be removed," as used in Act 1836, making it the duty of the overseers of every district to furnish relief to every poor person within the district, not having a settlement therein, who shall apply to them for relief, until such person can be removed to the place of his last settlement, means until such person can with propriety and safety be removed, and not the mere physical possibility of removal, and the statute does not permit, much less command, the transportation of a pauper whose state of health forbade removal. Kelly Tp. v. Union Tp. (Pa.) 5 Watts & S. 535, 536.

The allegation that property "cannot be divided without a sale" can have but one meaning, and that is that a partition in kind is impossible without virtual destruction of the property. That loss or injury to the parties, or some of them, is the natural sequence of an attempt to partition in kind that which cannot be divided without a sale, is too plain for discussion. Ballantyne v. Rusk, 36 Atl. 361, 362, 84 Md. 649.

As may.

"Can play," as used in Code, § 4213, prohibiting saloon keepers who have billiard tables on which the public can play from permitting minors to play thereon, means that the table is kept so that the public may play thereon, not necessarily for pay, but it must be such as the public are invited or permitted to play on. Sikes v. State, 67 Ala. 77, 81.

CANADA CURRENCY.

A note made and indorsed in Michigan, and payable "in Canada currency," is payable in lawful money, and is therefore negotiable. The phrase means simply that it is payable in Canada money at the Canada standard, and it is governed as to the amount it calls for by the same rule as if it had been made in Canada, payable in so many dollars, without containing a further direction. Black v. Ward, 27 Mich. 191, 200, 15 Am. Rep. 162.

CANADA MONEY.

A note negotiated and payable in "Canada money" is payable in such money as is current by law in Canada. Thompson v. Sloan, 23 Wend. 71, 75, 35 Am. Dec. 546.

CANAL.

See "Irrigation Canal."

"A canal is an artificial trench for transportation. They originate under state statutes and charters. Canals are constructed, owned, and managed either by the state itself or by a company incorporated by state law, and their use may be made subject to state tolls, which cannot be done by any state or under a state law with regard to navigable waters." The admiralty jurisdiction of the United States does not extend to canals. Warn v. Easton & McMahon Transit Co., 2 N. Y. Supp. 620, 622.

An incorporated canal includes as constituent parts the bed, berm bank, towpaths, and tollhouses, and collector's offices, and, if the canal is not subject to taxation, the property forming such constituent parts are not taxable. A house erected as a tollhouse by such a canal company is not subject to taxation, although it is occupied not merely as the collector's office, but also as his family residence. Schuylkill Nav. Co. v. Berks County Com'rs, 11 Pa. (1 Jones) 202, 203.

The term "canal," as treated in its application to each of the several canals in state of New York, embraces all the lands within the blue lines, as well the banks as the prism. Genesee Valley Canal R. Co. v. Slight, 1 N. Y. Supp. 554, 556, 49 Hun, 35, 14 N. Y. Civ. Proc. 420.

"Canal," as used in a deed wherein the property conveyed was described as bounded on one side by a line parallel with the northeasterly line of a certain canal two feet therefrom, meant the whole excavation made for the purpose of the canal, and that the line of the canal was therefore the top of the canal bank, and not the edge of the water. Bishop v. Seeley, 18 Conn. 389, 393.

As natural water course.

See "Natural Water Course."

As public highway.

A canal is a public highway, and is not the less so because of the tolls charged, or by reason of its being subject to the regulations of the company operating it. Barnett v. Johnson, 15 N. J. Eq. (2 McCart.) 481, 485.

A canal is a public highway within the meaning of a statute prescribing regulations for railroads crossing public highways. Lehigh Val. R. Co. v. Dover & R. R. Co., 43 N. J. Law (14 Vroom) 528, 531.

In Rev. St. Ind. 1838, p. 337, § 17, authorizing the board of internal commission to acquire by donation or purchase for the state the necessary ground for the profitable use of any water power that might be created by the construction of the Central Canal, the word "canal" means a navigable, public highway for the transportation of persons and property. It must not only be in a condition to hold that water that can be used for navigation, but it must have in it, as part of the structure itself, the water to be navigated ready for use. A mill race carrying water for hydraulic purposes is not enough. Kennedy v. Indianapolis, 103 U. S. 599, 604, 26 L. Ed. 550.

As public utility.

"A canal is such a public utility that private property may be subjected to its construction under the power of eminent domain." Cooper v. Williams, 4 Ohio (4 Ham.) 253, 287, 22 Am. Dec. 745.

CANAL BOAT.

Rev. St. § 4251 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 2029], providing that no "canal boat" shall be subject to a libel in any of the United States courts for the wages of any person who may be employed on board thereof, refers to the employment in which the vessel is engaged at the time of the rendition of the service, and not to the form of the vessel. "A vessel engaged in navigating the canals should be held to be a canal boat within the meaning of this statute, without reference to its form. A boat not engaged in navigating canals is not a canal boat within the meaning of this statute, whatever may be its form." Hence a boat which had been formerly navigating a canal was no longer a "canal boat" when it was employed in transporting articles about a harbor. Smith v. The William L. Norman (U. S.) 49 Fed. 285, 286

"Canal boat," as used in N. Y. Act May 6, 1870, fixing rates of wharfage, and providing that all "canal boats" navigating the canals in the states shall pay the same rates as heretofore, would include a vessel propelled by steam power for the sole purpose of towing boats on the canal. The Vermont (U. S.) 28 Fed. Cas. 1152.

Nature of towage as affecting.

A canal boat does not cease to be a canal boat because she is towed through a canal by a steam yacht, and hence is not liable for an employes' wages under Rev. St. § 4251 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 2929], providing that a canal boat without mast or steam power shall not be so liable. The George Urban, Jr. (U. S.) 70 Fed. 791, 792.

A canal boat is a canal boat only when it continues to be a boat on a canal, and although it has no mast or steam engine. Yet, when a steam tug is attached to it by a rope for the purpose of taking it from one part of the river to another, it does not become ipso facto a steamboat, and so remain ever after. Buckley v. Brown (U. S.) 4 Fed. Cas. 566, 567.

A boat built for canal navigation, which had been engaged in it during the season and was on a return voyage from Brooklyn in tow of a steamboat, a mode of navigation practiced by hundreds of canal boats, which are not by such an occasional trip transmuted from their primitive and unpretending character of "Podunk scows" into the more ambitious if not more respectable class of vessels of the United States. Hicks v. Williams (N. Y.) 17 Barb. 523, 529.

As vessel.

A canal boat is a vessel. The Hezekiah Baldwin (U. S.) 12 Fed. Cas. 93.

An act authorizing seizure of seagoing or ocean-bound vessels, or any other vessels, in order to collect a debt for towing, applies to canal boats. Crawford v. Collins (N. Y.) 45 Barb. 269, 271; Fralick v. Betts (N. Y.) 13 Hun, 632, 633. CONTRA, see Many v. Noyes (N. Y.) 5 Hill, 34, 35.

A canal boat is a vessel within the meaning of the statute providing for the collection of demands against ships and vessels. King v. Greenway, 71 N. Y. 413, 417.

A canal boat is not a vessel of the United States. Hicks v. Williams (N. Y.) 17 Barb. 523, 525.

CANAL FUND.

A "canal fund" is the fund established for the support of the canals. People v. New York Cent. R. Co. (N. Y.) 34 Barb. 123, 135.

Const. art. 7, §§ 1, 2, 3, providing that certain tolls chargeable on railroads should form a part of the state "canal funds," cannot be construed to mean that such revenue is a part of the canal, so that legislation with regard to such toll charges could be held to be legislation as to canals themselves. The revenues of a person, natural or artificial, are not the person nor a part of the person. "Canal," as used in the Constitution, must be construed in its ordinary sense, meaning a material structure, and only such things are a part of the canal as are necessary to its use or consequent upon its position. The constitutional provision (article 7, § 6) that the Legislature shall not sell, lease, or otherwise dispose of any of the canals of the state refers to the structures of the canals, and a disposition of a part of their revenues, or of any funds appropriated to their support, is not forbidden. People v. New York Cent. R. Co. (N. Y.) 34 Barb. 123, 132.

CANCEL—CANCELLATION.

To cancel is to annul. Golden v. Fowler, 26 Ga. 451, 464.

To "cancel" is to cross out, to "obliterate" is to blot out. The former leaves the words legible; the latter leaves the words illegible. By either method a will can be legally revoked in whole or in part. Townshend v. Howard, 29 Atl. 1077, 1078, 86 Me. 285.

"Cancel," as used in an agreement by one person to cancel the indebtedness of another to a third person, means to "pay." Auburn City Bank v. Leonard (N. Y.) 40 Barb. 119, 120.

Annul synonymous.

One meaning of the word "cancel" is to "annul," and hence, where arbitrators found that a mortgage and note should be null and void and canceled, "cancel" was synonymous with "annul." Golden v. Fowler, 26 Ga. 451, 464.

Defacement or obliteration necessary.

There can be no such thing as the "cancellation" of an instrument, either as a physical fact or as a legal inference, unless the instrument itself is in some form defaced or obliterated. Such is the express definition of the term in legal significance. In re Akers' Will, 77 N. Y. Supp. 643, 646, 74 App. Div. 461.

Effect.

In Capital City Mut. Fire Ins. Co. v. Detwiler, 23 Ill. App. 656, the court says the term "cancellation of a contract" necessarily implies a waiver of all rights thereunder by the parties. If, after breach by one of the parties, they agree to cancel it, and make a new contract with reference to this new subject-matter, that is a waiver of any cause of action growing out of the original breach, and this is the rule even though the original contract was under seal. Dreifus v. Columbian Exposition Salvage Co., 45 Atl. 370, 372, 194 Pa. 475, 75 Am. St. Rep. 704.

Agreement.

"Cancel," as used in an agreement indorsed on a prior agreement to purchase land, which states that for value received "we cancel" the annexed and within agreement, means no more than "doing away with," and hence is not sufficient to authorize the party purchasing the land to recover prior payments of the purchase price. Winton v. Spring, 18 Cal. 451, 455.

Cancellation is appropriate when there is an apparently valid written agreement of a transaction embodied in writing, while in fact, by reason of mistake of both or one of the parties, either no agreement at all has really been made, or the agreement is different from that which was intended. De Voin v. De Voin, 44 N. W. 839, 841, 76 Wis. 66 (citing Pom. Eq. Jur. pp. 343, 344).

Insurance policy.

Where a fire insurance policy was made void by the removal of the insured goods to another building in another town, "cancellation" is not an accurate term to describe it, though it is used by the parties. The policy is not canceled, but rendered nugatory and void by the insured's own act. Davison v. London & Lancashire Fire Ins. Co., 42 Atl. 2, 3, 189 Pa. 132.

Lease.

"Canceled," as used in a will directing land be sold so soon as the leases are canceled, will not be construed to mean expired or determined, but in its ordinary sense, and so will authorize the tenants to cancel the lease before the expiration of the term. Toland v. Toland, 55 Pac. 681, 682, 123 Cal. 140.

Mortgage.

Revision, p. 707, § 23, providing that when any mortgage, duly registered, shall be redeemed, it shall be the duty of the clerk, on application by the mortgagor or the person redeeming and producing to him such mortgage canceled, or a receipt thereof signed by the mortgagor or his executors, administrators, or assigns, to enter in a margin to be left for that purpose, opposite the abstract, a minute of such redemption, is satisfied by the act of tearing off the seals on such mortgage, if done with the intent of cancellation. Baldwin v. Howell, 15 Atl. 236, 242, 45 N. J. Eq. (18 Stew.) 519.

The mere tearing off of the seals of a mortgage by an unauthorized person does not amount to a cancellation, nor, indeed, will its entire destruction in such a manner. It must be given up and canceled by consent of the owner. Lilly v. Quick, 2 N. J. Eq. (1 H. W. Green) 97, 103.

Revenue stamp.

U. S. Revenue Act, requiring certain instruments to be stamped and the stamp canceled by the initials of the person using or affixing the same, does not require such cancellation to be made by affixing the initials of all those who may become parties to the instrument; as, for instance, where a note passes through the hands of several indorsers, the initials of the person originally using the stamp are a sufficient cancellation. Spear v. Alexander, 42 Ala. 572, 575.

Will.

The word "canceled" is derived from the word "cancelli," crossbars or latticework. Hence, as originally used, it referred to making cross-lines in the writing, and is defined by Webster: "To cross lines of a writing and deface it." From this is derived the synonym as defined by Webster: "To annul or destroy, as to cancel an obligation." Therefore, where it is apparent that the cross-lines in a will have been made by a testator with the evident intention of effecting a revocation, it has been held that such an act is sufficient to work a revocation of the will, as provided by 2 Rev. St. p. 64, § 42, which outlines two general methods of revocation—by destruction or cancellation. In re Alger's Will, 77 N. Y. Supp. 166, 167, 38 Misc. Rep. 143.

Where a will is so marked by testator, whether by lines drawn across it or otherwise, as to show that the act was designed by him to render the will of no effect, there is a cancellation. Warner v. Warner's Estate, 37 Vt. 356, 362.

In order to operate as a revocation of a will, cancellation thereof must be made with the intention that it shall operate as a revocation. Revocation is an act of the mind, which can be demonstrated by some outward and visible sign. Dan v. Brown (N. Y.) 4 Cow. 483, 490, 15 Am. Dec. 395.

As used in Rev. St. pt. 2, p. 64, c. 6, tit. 1, art. 2, § 42, providing that no will in writing, nor any part thereof, shall be revoked or altered otherwise than by some other will in writing, or unless such will be burned, torn, canceled, obliterated, or destroyed, with the intent and for the purpose of revoking the same by the testator himself, "canceled" means something more than the mere act of canceling, and includes animo revocandi. "The cancellation of a will does not necessarily involve its revocation. The canceling itself is an equivocal act, and, in order to operate as a revocation, must be done animo revocandi." In re Wood's Will, 11 N. Y. Supp. 157, 2 Con. Sur. 144.

A "cancellation of a will" is any act done to it which in common understanding would be regarded as a cancellation if done to any other instrument, and it is not understood to mean exclusively drawing crossed lines on the paper. Appeal of Evans, 58 Pa. (8 P. F. Smith) 238, 244.

A will is not canceled because of a writing on a sheet of paper attached to it, or even on the will itself, stating "I revoke this will," under the statute providing that it shall be canceled only by burning or destroying the same, or by some writing witnessed as a will is witnessed, where nothing was done to any portion of the written or printed matter constituting the will, no part of which was altered and no interlineation made, and all that constituted the will remained as perfect as when first written. In re Ladd, 18 N. W. 734, 736, 60 Wis. 187, 50 Am. Rep. 355.

Same—By drawing line through signature.

A "cancellation" is in legal meaning an equivalent to and synonymous with an "obliteration." This cancellation or obliteration may be effected by words written across the instrument, as "obliterated" or "canceled." The end may be equally well accomplished by any erasure, partial or complete; it may be done by drawing the pen through the words. Any act of this sort is effectual, for the reason that it puts the instrument in condition whereby its invalidity appears on its face the moment it is produced. Under a statute providing that a will may be revoked by burning, tearing, or obliterating it, a line drawn lengthwise through the name of testatrix, or an upright line through each of the words thereof, accompanied by a declaration or intention to destroy the will, is a sufficient obliteration. Glass v. Scott, 60 Pac. 186, 188, 14 Colo. App. 377.

One of the recognized modes of revoking a will is by cancellation. In its primal significance the word means a "latticework." As applied to writings, it means the nullification of a writing by drawing upon its face lines in the form of a latticework, crisscross. Usually, in legal as well as in common acceptance, cancellation is accomplished by the drawing of any lines over or across words with intent to nullify them. It is a common business practice to cancel negotiable instruments and other written contracts by drawing such lines through the signature of the maker, and where such form of cancellation has been used in the will it is sufficient to revoke it. In re Olmsted's Estate, 54 Pac. 745, 746, 122 Cal. 224.

Same—By marking "canceled."

A will may be canceled by any act done to it which stamps upon it an intention that it shall have no effect, though the act be not a complete obliteration or physical destruction. As distinguished from "destruction," "cancellation" implies a preservation of the instrument with something on it indicative that it has ceased to be operative. Writing the word "canceled" on a will operates as a cancellation thereof. Appeal of Evans, 58 Pa. (8 P. F. Smith) 238, 242.

Same—By marking "obsolete."

The word "canceling" in Act April 8, 1833, § 13, authorizing the revocation of a will by burning, cancelling, obliterating, or destroying the same, does not include the act of testator in writing the word "obsolete" on the margin of his will, without signing the same. Lewis v. Lewis (Pa.) 2 Watts & S. 455, 457.

Same—By tearing.

Tearing is one of the modes of canceling a will. Doe v. Perkes, 3 B. & A. 489, 492.

CANDIDATE.

Any candidate, see "Any."

The term "candidates" is used to designate the person voted for at an election. State v. Hirsch, 24 N. E. 1062, 1063, 125 Ind. 207, 9 L. R. A. 170.

In Const. art. 8, § 9, providing that any person who shall, while a candidate for office, be guilty of bribery, fraud, or willful violation of any election law, etc., shall be punished, "candidate" means one who seeks or aspires to some office or privilege, or who offers himself for the same. "A man is a candidate for an office when he is seeking such office, and is just as much a candidate prior to his nomination as after." Leonard v. Commonwealth, 4 Atl. 220, 224, 112 Pa. 607.

CANDLE.

The origin of the expression "sale by the candle," or "by the inch of candle," arose from the use of candles as a means of measuring time. It was declared the goods would be continued to be offered to bidders for so long a time only as would suffice for the burning of one inch of candle. When the measure was wasted to that extent, the highest bidder was then declared to be the purchaser. Crandall v. State, 28 Ohio St. 479, 481 (citing 3 P. Cyc.).

CANDLING.

"Candling" is a process, by means of artificial light, for determining the quality and condition of eggs. A contract whereby the seller was to candle the eggs sold is evidence tending to show a warranty as to the condition of the eggs. King v. C. C. Bendell Commission Co., 44 Pac. 377, 7 Colo. App. 607.

CANT.

"Cant" is synonymous with "licitation," and is a mode of dividing the estates held in common. Hayes v. Cuny (La.) 9 Mart. (O. S.) 87, 89.

CANVASS.

One of the dictionary definitions of the word "canvass" is "to apply to or address" people "with reference to prospective action," "to solicit, or go about soliciting, orders," etc. There is nothing in such definition which necessarily means traveling about or over a given territory, for, if the same result may be reached from a central point, a canvass has none the less been made. Keene v. Frick Co. (Iowa) 93 N. W. 582, 583.

A contract giving an agent authority to sell and "canvass" for the sale of sewing machines does not per se confer the power to purchase or hire a horse to aid the agent in locomotion. Howe Mach. Co. v. Ashley, 60 Ala. 496, 497.

Election.

"Canvass," as used in Comp. Laws, § 1489, providing that any candidate or person claiming a right to hold an office contested shall give notice thereof within 20 days after the canvassing of the votes for such election, includes all the proceedings for determining the result of an election, from the close of the polls to the formal declaration of who are elected. The word is defined by Webster, as a verb, to mean "to examine thoroughly, to search or scrutinize," and as a noun, as "a close inspection, or to know the state of," and by Bouvier as the act of examining the result of votes for public officers. Bowler v. Eisenhood, 48 N. W. 136, 137, 1 S. D. 577, 12 L. R. A. 705.

In the Standard Dictionary the following definitions are given of the word "canvass": "To examine searchingly; to ascertain the number or the facts concerning each; going over in detail; scrutinize; sift—as to canvass the vote in an election; canvassing votes cast; an official scrutiny as a canvass of votes at an election." Where the judges of election ascertain the number of votes cast in their township or precinct by making a tally sheet from the ballots, it is unquestionably canvassing the vote, but their canvass does not determine the result as to state, district, or county offices, the board of supervisors ascertaining the number of votes cast in the county by making the abstracts required by the statute from the returns, and thereby ascertaining the person having the greatest number of votes for any county office, and declaring who is elected; and under the statute the board of state canvassers canvass the vote from the abstracts returned by the county board. Each of these canvasses is a "canvass of the votes," within Code 1873, § 697, requiring a statement of contest of an election to a county office to be filed within 20 days after the votes are canvassed, and the fact that the canvass of the county and state boards is made from returns renders them none the less a canvass of the votes. The proceeding of contest is by one who claims to be elected against one who has been declared elected; therefore it cannot be instituted until it is known who is the incumbent. In the case of county officers it is not until the canvass of the votes is made by the county board that the result can be officially known, and, in the case of district and state officers, not until the state board has made its canvass of the votes and declared the result. Neither canvass is any more a canvass of the votes than the other, and, having in view the purpose of the statute providing the mode of contesting elections, it is clear that the intention of the General Assembly was that the statement of contest must be filed within 20 days after the day when the canvass of the votes was made that determined the result as to the particular office in question. Clark v. Tracy, 64 N. W. 290, 291, 95 Iowa, 410.

A "canvass" of an election includes not only the counting of the votes by the inspectors, but the record of the count by the poll clerks upon the tally sheet, so that the tally sheet is a substantial part of a canvass. In re Stewart, 48 N. Y. Supp. 957, 963, 24 App. Div. 201.

A canvass is but a count of the ballots, a convenient and expeditious method of determining the choice of the people as disclosed by the ballots. As between the ballots themselves and a canvass of the ballots, the ballots are controlling. Hudson v. Solomon, 19 Kan. 177, 180.

"Canvass," as applied to an election, would seem to impose an obligation beyond that of merely counting the ballots and comparing the statements of the managers. "Canvassing" implies searching, scrutiny, investigation, examination. State v. Nerland, 7 S. C. 241, 246.

"Canvass," as applied to election returns, does not necessarily mean to count the ballots, and to give it the latter meaning would be to defeat the purpose of a statute which provides that the election shall be conducted in accordance with the general election laws of the state; and, as the ballots were under such statute to be returned to the county clerk, the canvassing board could not get possession of them to count. To "canvass the returns" and to "canvass the votes" are frequently used synonymously. People v. Town of Sausalito, 39 Pac. 937, 938, 106 Cal. 500.

CANVASSER.

A canvasser is a traveling salesman who goes out on the road soliciting orders for his house, and taking with him samples of the goods or wares his house deals in. Such a person is not a "traveling vendor," within Acts 1890, No. 150, imposing a tax on traveling vendors. Pegues v. Ray, 23 South. 904, 905, 50 La. Ann. 574.

To "canvass" means to go about a region or district, to solicit votes, orders, subscriptions, or the like; traverse a district or region for inquiry, or in the effort to obtain something; to canvass a territory for a subscription book; and one who went from house to house in a given city, exhibiting samples and taking orders, which were then filled from a warehouse or distributing point, is a canvasser, and not a traveling salesman, within Act Ga. December 14, 1896, prohibiting municipal authorities from levying or collecting "any tax or license on any traveling salesman engaged in taking orders for the sale of goods where no delivery of goods is made at the time of taking such order." L. B. Price Co. v. City of Atlanta, 31 S. E. 619, 623, 105 Ga. 358.

Of elections.

The term "canvass" implies search, scrutiny, investigation, examination; and the term "canvassers" employed to designate the duties of the commissioners would seem to impose an obligation beyond that of merely counting the ballots and comparing the statements of the managers of the election. Ex parte Mackey, 15 S. C. 322, 332.

County canvassers "are not a judicial or quasi judicial body. They are not a permanent body with administrative functions. They are created for a single occasion and for a single object. They have no means given them to inquire, and no right to inquire, beyond the returns of the local election boards. When they have figured up the returns exactly as handed over to them, they have completed their task and exhausted their powers." Attorney General v. Board of County Canvassers of Iron County, 31 N. W. 539, 540, 64 Mich. 607.

CANVASSING BOARD.

A canvassing board is a board appointed by law for the purpose of canvassing the returns of election officers and returning and verifying the result of the election. Wells v. Taylor, 3 Pac. 255, 258, 5 Mont. 202.

CANYON.

Gen. Railroad Law, § 309, provides that any railroad whose right of way extends through any canyon, pass, or defile shall not exclude any other corporation from a passage through the same upon equitable terms, and in case of disagreement, on application of either of the parties with notice to the other, the same shall be adjusted by a court of competent jurisdiction. Held, that the word "canyon" means a way or passage between steep hills or mountains, or precipitous bluffs of earth or rock, where there is only room for one right of way, or for but the construction of but one track. Montana Cent. R. Co. v. Helena & R. M. R. Co., 12 Pac. 916, 919, 6 Mont. 416.

CAPABLE.

"Capable of contracting," as used in Comp. Laws 1879, c. 67, § 3, providing that no contract of a minor can be disaffirmed where, on account of the minor's own representations as to his majority, or of his having been engaged in business as an adult, the other party had good reasons to believe the minor "capable of contracting," means legally capable of contracting, and occurs either when the party has reached the age of majority, or, being a minor, has been vested with legal capacity by an act of the Legislature, or by a judgment of a court in a proper sense, and cannot be construed as meaning mentally and physically capable of contracting. Burgett v. Barrick, 25 Kan. 526, 530.

Code Ga. § 2314, providing that in case of an executed trust for the benefit of a person "capable of taking and managing property" in his own right the legal title be merged immediately into the equitable interest, refers to the mental, and not to the physical, capacity. Sargent v. Burdett, 22 S. E. 667, 668, 96 Ga. 111.

CAPACITY.

See "Legal Capacity"; "Mental Capacity"; "Natural Capacity to Contract"; "Testamentary Capacity."

As used in Rev. St. § 3264, requiring that every distillery, before operations are commenced, shall be surveyed for the purpose of estimating and determining its spirit "producing capacity for a day of 24 hours," is employed for the purpose of expressing with certainty and precision the exact period of duration for which the average capacity of production was to be ascertained, and nothing but the average was intended, inasmuch as no distillery has any spirit producing capacity in 24 hours. Chicago Distilling Co. v. Stone, 11 Sup. Ct. 862, 864, 140 U. S. 647, 35 L. Ed. 532.

Of a canal.

Capacity of a canal is a well-understood term in engineering, and means the volume of water that it is capable of conveying, estimated on width, depth, and grade. Wyatt

v. Larimer & W. Irr. Co., 29 Pac. 906, 913, 1 Colo. App. 480.

Of a vessel.

Where the contract between the shipper of goods and the master of a vessel refers to the capacity of a vessel, and it appears that the shipper refused to allow an agreement to be placed in the bill of lading to the effect that part of the cargo might be carried on deck, the phrase "capacity of the vessel" refers to its underdeck capacity. Clifton v. Sheldon, 66 U. S. (1 Black) 494, 500, 17 L. Ed. 155.

CAPE.

As garment.

"Cape," as used in an indictment charging accused with the larceny of a "cape," will be construed in its popular and usual acceptation, so as to mean a shoulder wrap, the word meaning either a garment or part of a garment used for covering the shoulders of the wearer, notwithstanding the word "cape" also means a neck or narrow strip of land extending some distance into a body of water, since such formation of land cannot be the subject of larceny, and also notwithstanding that the word "cape" means the coping of a wall, and also ears of corn broken off in threshing in certain restricted localities in the northern part of England; the word will be understood in its plain, ordinary, and popular meaning in our country and among our people. Waller v. People, 51 N. E. 900, 175 Ill. 221.

As point of land.

A cape as a point of land extending into a lake; projecting into the water; a head land; a piece of land jutting into the water beyond the rest of the coast line; a promontory. United States v. McNeely (U. S.) 28 Fed. 609, 611.

CAPIAS.

A "capias" is a writ issued by the court or clerk, and directed to any sheriff of the state of Texas, commanding him to arrest a person accused of an offense, and bring him before that court forthwith, or on a day or at a term stated in the writ. Code Cr. Proc. Tex. 1895, art. 493.

CAPIAS AD SATISFACIENDUM.

A capias ad satisfaciendum, as respects the party against whom it is taken, is a full satisfaction by force, act, and judgment of law, so that against him and his representatives there can be no other capias issued; for when the plaintiff has begun and chosen the body he cannot resort to another execution against the same party. It is a complete satisfaction of that very suit and judgment in which it is taken. Strong v. Linn, 5 N. J. Law (2 Southard) 799, 803.

CAPITAL.

See "Available Capital"; "Cash Capital"; "Moneyed Capital"; "Present Capital"; "Whole Capital"; "Working Capital."

Capital in commerce, as applied to individuals, is those objects, whether consisting of money or other property, which a merchant, trader, or other person adventures in an undertaking. Pearce v. City of Augusta, 37 Ga. 597, 599.

As defined by Webster, "capital" is the stock in trade, in manufactories, or in any business requiring the expenditure of money with a view to profit. Capital in a mercantile sense is the money which is employed to make other sums, and a capitalist is a person who trades with capital, and is commonly denominated a "monied man." London Encyl. tit. "Capital." The popular sense of the term "capital" is money invested in business for the purpose of making profits thereon. Sun Mut. Ins. Co. v. City of New York, 8 N. Y. (4 Seld.) 241, 245.

"The word 'capital' has a well-defined meaning. It is said to be the sum which a merchant, trader, or other person or association adventures in any business requiring the expenditure of money with a view to profit." Bouvier defines it as "the sum of money which a merchant, bank, or trader adventures in any undertaking, or which he contributes to the common stock of a partnership." It has been defined by the Supreme Court of the United States as property taken from other investments or uses, and set apart for and invested in the special business, and in the increase, proceeds, or earnings of which property, beyond expenditures incurred in its use, consists the profits made in the business. When we speak of the capital invested in a business, we mean the money which is put into that business with the intention that it shall be used in the transaction of the business. The word "capital" is so used in Gen. Laws, c. 24, providing that nonresidents of the state doing business therein shall be taxed on the capital invested in such business as personal property. People v. Feitner, 67 N. Y. Supp. 893, 894, 56 App. Div. 280.

The capital of a merchant is that fund which is put up and subjected to the risks of his business as a basis of credit, and as a security to mercantile creditors against loss from the misfortunes of trade." Webb v. Armistead (U. S.) 26 Fed. 70, 71.

The capital of a corporation consists of its funds, securities, credits, and property, of whatever kind, which it possesses. Christensen v. Eno, 12 N. E. 648, 649, 106 N. Y. 97, 60 Am. Rep. 429 (citing Burrall v. Bushwick R. Co., 75 N. Y. 211, 212).

Accumulated profits.

Where a mutual insurance company is authorized to accumulate from its profits a fund to continue liable for its losses during the term of its existence, and to issue certificates to its members setting forth their interest therein, the accumulation becomes capital, and is subject to taxation as such. Sun Mut. Ins. Co. v. City of New York, 8 N. Y. (4 Seld.) 241, 250.

The word "capital," as applied to money of a corporation, may refer to the money paid in by the stockholders for the use of the corporation, commonly known as the "capital stock," but in a higher and more popular sense it includes all the money and other property of the corporation used in transacting its business. So long as the profits are not withdrawn from the business, they constitute a part of the capital. Iowa State Sav. Bank v. City Council of Burlington, 61 N. W. 851, 852, 98 Iowa, 737.

"Capital," as used in a will directing that the executor shall allow "my present capital" to remain in a partnership business, which had been formed by written agreement, under which the testator and his partner agreed to put in a certain amount as capital, and by which each was entitled to draw out annually his share of the annual profits, but none of the capital, or any of the accrued but undivided profits, the words "my present capital" meant only the capital proper, which the testator had contributed to the business, and not also the accumulated and undivided profits which had accrued from the use of that capital. Dean v. Dean, 11 N. W. 239, 241, 54 Wis. 23.

"Capital," as used in Act Cong. June 30, 1864, § 79, 13 Stat. 251, providing that bankers using or employing a capital not exceeding $50,000 should pay $100 for each license, means the amount of capital fixed by the charter, and would not include surplus earned by the bank. Mechanics' & Farmers' Bank v. Townsend (U. S.) 16 Fed. Cas. 1306.

The capital of an estate, within the meaning of a direction in a will that the capital be held in trust and the income given to certain beneficiaries, includes profits of corporation stock made before testator's death, but does not include stock earnings after his death, though the benefit thereof is given to the stockholder through new stock issues. Appeal of Earp, 28 Pa. (4 Casey) 368, 371.

As actual assets.

In its broadest meaning, the word "capital" signifies actual assets, whether in money or property, owned by an individual or a corporation. It is the fund upon which a corporation transacts business, which is liable to its creditors, and in case of insolvency passes to a receiver. The capital of a bank is not composed of immovable property. State v. Board of Assessors, 18 South. 753, 48 La. Ann. 35.

As capital stock.

See, also, "Capital Stock."

The terms "capital" and "capital stock" are in legal intendment synonymous. New Orleans City Gaslight Co. v. Board of Assessors, 31 La. Ann. 475, 477; Foster v. Stevens, 22 Atl. 78, 79, 63 Vt. 175, 13 L. R. A. 166.

The word "capital," applied to corporations, is often used interchangeably with the words "capital stock." Strictly speaking, however, the "capital stock" of a corporation is the money contributed by the corporators to the capital, and is usually represented by shares issued to subscribers of the stock on the initiation of the corporate enterprise. Christensen v. Eno, 12 N. E. 648, 649, 106 N. Y. 97, 60 Am. Rep. 429 (citing Burrall v. Bushwick R. Co., 75 N. Y. 211, 212).

The word "capital," in relation to the taxation of corporations, has a well-defined meaning, for it and "capital stock" are used indiscriminately to designate the estate of the corporation. Comstock, J., in People v. Com'rs of Taxes, 23 N. Y. 192, cited and approved in People v. Coleman, 128 N. Y. 433, 27 N. E. 818, 12 L. R. A. 762. Thus, in a statement by the corporation that its capital is worth par, and a certain amount of its capital stock has been paid in, such statement is equivalent to saying that the estate of the company is worth the amount of money paid in. People v. Barker, 28 N. Y. Supp. 971, 972, 75 Hun, 6.

Civ. Code, § 309, provides that the directors of a corporation must not make dividends except of the surplus profits; they must not divide, withdraw, or pay to the stockholders any part of the capital stock. Held, that the words "capital stock" mean the money and property with which the corporation carries on its corporate business, and are used synonymously with "capital." Kohl v. Lillenthal, 81 Cal. 378, 385, 22 Pac. 689, 6 L. R. A. 520.

A tax on shares of stock is not a tax on the capital of the corporation; the two are very different things. "Capital" or "capital stock" belongs to the corporation; the "shares" to the individuals. As used in Revenue Law 1890, § 8, subsec. 2, providing for the taxation of capital, including money, credits, or other things remaining invested, etc., it signifies the money or other thing invested, and therefore includes shares of stock in the hands of the stockholders; but as used in section 8, subsec. 3, providing for the taxation of the value of all capital of incorporated joint-stock companies not otherwise taxed, it signifies the capital stock of the company; that is, the aggregate of the mutual subscriptions of the stockholders, paid in, as a basis of the business of the concern and which belongs to the company. Commonwealth v. Charlottesville Perpetual Bldg. & Loan Co., 20 S. E. 364, 365, 90 Va. 790, 44 Am. St. Rep. 950.

"Capital," as used in Rev. St. p. 338, § 4, subd. 7, exempting from taxation the personal property of every corporate company not made liable to taxation on its capital, means only capital stock, hence a savings bank having no capital stock is not within the statute. People v. Coleman, 31 N. E. 1022, 135 N. Y. 231.

As used in Act Feb. 11, 1848, § 12, providing that, at any time after the expiration of 10 years from the time any railroad may be put in operation, the General Assembly may prescribe its rates for transportation, provided that no reduction shall be made unless the net profits of the company, on an average for the previous 10 years, shall amount to a sum equal to 10 per cent. per annum upon its capital, and then not so as to reduce the future probable profits below the said per cent., "capital" means the actual capital stock of the company, and not also the accumulated profits retained in its business as represented by the actual value of the property of the company. "When applied to corporations, the word 'capital' is sometimes used in the sense of 'corporate property,' and is distinguished from the 'shares' and 'certificates' of stock, which are the individual property of the stockholders, and form no part of the company; but the 'capital' of a corporation is generally understood and defined to be 'the property or means contributed by the stockholders as the fund or basis for the business or enterprise for which the corporation was formed.' The word 'stock' is sometimes added, and the phrase 'capital stock' is used convertibly with the word 'capital.'" Iron Ry. Co. v. Lawrence Furnace Co., 30 N. E. 616, 620, 49 Ohio St. 102.

The word "capital" in Acts 1898, p. 14, § 25, providing a privilege tax where the capital of a cotton seed oilmill is between certain amounts, means "capital," and not "capital stock." Hazlehurst Oilmill & Fertilizer Co. v. Decell (Miss.) 33 South. 412.

Capital stock distinguished.

See, also, "Capital Stock."

The "capital" of a corporation is its property, while the "capital stock" of a corporation represents the interest of stockholders in the corporation, and is their property. Wetherbee v. Baker, 35 N. J. Eq. (8 Stew.) 501, 505.

There is a distinction between the "capital" and the "capital stock" of a corporation. The "capital" of a corporation is the property or means which the corporation owns, and it may vary in amount, while the "capital stock" is fixed, and represents the interest of the stockholders, and is their property. Wells v. Green Bay & M. Canal Co., 64 N. W. 69, 72, 90 Wis. 442.

"Capital" and "capital stock" are in legal intentment synonymous, and are used in legislative acts as equivalent terms, though strictly not of the same meaning. "Capital stock" means, not shares of stock, either separately or in the aggregate, but is intended to designate the property of the corporation subject to taxation, not in separate parcels, but in a homogeneous unity. Foster v. Stevens, 22 Atl. 78, 79, 63 Vt. 175, 13 L. R. A. 166.

Strictly speaking, "capital stock" in a corporation or association is quite different from "capital" of either, the one referring to the tangible, and the other to rights in property, evidenced, in case of a corporation, by certificates of stock. But the terms are used interchangeably and synonymously in laws and decisions. The term "capital" as accurately described the intangible property rights of members of an unincorporated association engaged in the business of banking in the property of the association as the term "capital stock." State v. Lewis, 95 N. W. 388, 390, 118 Wis. 432.

Bank building.

The banking house of a bank is a part of the capital of the institution, represented by its shares of stock. Hence payment of taxes upon the par value of the shares exempt the building from further taxation under Act March 31, 1870, providing that state banks, upon the payment of 1 per cent. taxation upon all their capital, should be exempt from all other taxation upon their shares, capital, and profit. Neither would the fact that a portion of the building was rented out for other than banking purposes subject that portion of it to other taxation. Lackawanna County v. First Nat. Bank, 94 Pa. 221, 224.

As fund contributed.

The capital of a corporation is the property or means contributed by the stockholders as the fund or basis for the business for which the corporation was formed. State v. Jones, 37 N. E. 945, 950, 51 Ohio St. 492.

The capital of a bank is the fund paid by its shareholders on their capital stock. United States v. Bank of Montreal (U. S.) 21 Fed. 236, 240.

In determining the meaning of the term "moneyed capital," in Rev. St. § 5219 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3502], providing that shares of stock in a national bank shall not be taxed at a greater rate than is assessed on other moneyed capital in the hands of individuals in the state, the court said an acceptable definition of the term "capital" is found in Bailey v. Clark, 88 U. S. (21 Wall.) 284, 286, 22 L. Ed. 651, as follows: "When used with respect to the property of a corporation or association, the term has a settled meaning. It applies only to the property or means contributed by the stockholders as the fund or basis for the business or enterprise for which the corporation or association was formed. As to them the term does not embrace temporary loans, though the money borrowed be directly appropriated in their business or undertakings. And, when used with respect to the property of individuals in any particular business, the term has substantially the same import. It then means the property taken from other investments or uses and set apart for an investment in the special business, and the increase, proceeds, or earnings of which property, beyond expenditures incurred in its use, consists of profits made in the business. It does not, any more than when used with respect to corporations, embrace temporary loans made in the regular course of business. As very justly observed by the circuit judge, it would not satisfy the demands of common honesty if a man engaged in business of any kind being asked the amount of capital employed in his business, should include in his reply all the sums which in the conduct of his business he had borrowed and had not yet repaid." First Nat. Bank v. Turner, 57 N. E. 110, 112, 154 Ind. 456.

The word "capital" in Laws 1896, c. 908, § 182, authorizing the imposition of a franchise tax on corporations, to be imposed on such portion of the capital stock as par as the amount of the capital employed within the state bears to the entire capital of the corporation, means the property of the corporation contributed by its shareholders, or otherwise obtained by it to the extent required by its charter. People v. Roberts, 72 N. Y. Supp. 950, 952, 66 App. Div. 157.

Income distinguished.

"Capital," as used in a will creating a trust, and providing for the final disposition of the capital thereof, and which in another clause the testator speaks of as his "capital" or "principal," is to be construed as including the corpus of the residuary estate, whether consisting of real or personal property, as contradistinguished from the "income" thereof. Penfield v. Tower, 46 N. W. 413, 416, 1 N. D. 216.

Insurance premiums.

"Capital," as used in 1 Rev. St. c. 13, § 1, tit. 4, providing that all moneyed or stock corporations shall be taxable upon their capital, means "the fund upon which the corporation transacts its business, which would be liable to its creditors, and in case of insolvency passes to a receiver. In this sense the court held that premiums for insurance paid or contracted to be paid in contemplation of future risks constituted capital stock subject to taxation. The word 'capital' is not used in the tax laws as a technical term, depending upon certain fixed conditions without which it cannot exist. It may be paid in as 'capital' in the strict sense of the term, and as an indispensable preliminary to the complete organization of a corporation. This is done when its dealings and business transactions are with strangers, and not with those who ipso facto become its members or corporators, or it may proceed from and be created by premiums or earnings paid by its own members." People v. Supervisors of City and County of New York, 16 N. Y. 424, 427.

Laws 1896, c. 908, require the capital stock of every company, together with the surplus profit or revenue fund exceeding 10 per cent. of its capital, to be assessed for taxation at its actual cash value. Held, that a fund consisting of unearned premiums held by a fidelity insurance company as a reinsurance reserve fund, as required by Insurance Law, § 22, was a part of the capital, and hence taxable. People v. Feltner, 31 Misc. Rep. 433, 434, 65 N. Y. Supp. 523, 525.

Seat in stock exchange.

The value of a seat in the New York Stock Exchange is not capital invested in business. A broker, in the purchase and sale of stocks and bonds, who neither receives nor delivers stocks, but merely conducts the transaction on the floor of the exchange, giving up the name of the purchaser or seller to his principal, is in the position of one rendering services, and cannot be regarded as conducting a business in which capital is invested, in the legal sense. The money that he has paid for his membership or seat is for the mere facility to transact his particular business, and to surround it with such safeguards of rectitude and honorable dealing as tend to promote both rapidity and safety in his transactions. It is apparent that the value of this seat or membership, while enabling the relator to carry on his business with facility and safety, does not fall within any of the definitions of "invested capital." People v. Feltner, 60 N. E. 265, 268, 167 N. Y. 1, 82 Am. St. Rep. 698.

In Bailey v. Clark, 88 U. S. (21 Wall.) 284, 286, 22 L. Ed. 651, the Supreme Court of the United States defined "capital" to mean property taken from other investments or uses and set apart for and invested in the special business, and in the increase, proceeds, or earnings of which property, beyond expenditures incurred in its use, consists the profits made in the business. In Lyon v. Zimmer (U. S.) 30 Fed. 401, 410, is found this definition: "Capital is the fund dedicated to a business to support its credit, to provide for contingencies, suffer diminution from loss, and to derive accretions from gains and profits." In 1 Bouvier's Law Dict. p. 283, "capital" is defined as the sum of money which a merchant, banker, or trader adventures in any undertaking, or which he contributes to the common stock of a partnership. The sum which a broker paid in order to gain admission to the floor of the New York Stock Exchange where he might meet from time to time numerous other brokers having stocks to purchase or sell, is in no proper legal sense capital. People v. Feltner, 60 N. E. 265, 268, 167 N. Y. 1, 82 Am. St. Rep. 698.

Shares of other corporation.

The property of a corporation is called its capital. The capital of a corporation is the same as the capital of an individual. Where a corporation holds certificates of stock in another corporation, such certificates are not taxable as capital, since the property represented by them is taxable against the corporation issuing them. People v. Board of Assessors, 30 N. Y. Supp. 448.

As shares of stock.

See, also, "Capital Stock"; "Share of Stock."

The capital of a corporation and the shares of its stockholders are different forms of the same thing. There is no value to the stock, independent of the property which it represents. The property of the corporation is the property of the stockholders who compose it, and the shares held by each represent his interest in the corporate assets. Richardson v. City of St. Albans, 47 Atl. 100, 72 Vt. 1.

The word "capital," as used in the act of the Legislature of 1836 exempting the capital of the Citizens' Bank of Louisiana, was intended to include that which represented the capital—the shares in the hands of those who had subscribed to the capital stock. This was the usual meaning of the terms employed at the time such act was passed, and before the capital was distinguished from shares of stock, and made to mean the value of the property of the corporation. Penrose v. Chaffraix, 30 South. 718, 720, 106 La. 250.

Shares of stock distinguished.

See, also, "Capital Stock"; "Share of Stock."

The term "capital," when applied to a bank, does not include the interests of its stockholders, and therefore shares in a bank, whether national or state, are subject to taxation against the stockholder, without regard to the fact that the capital of such bank is vested in the bonds of the United States, declared by statutes creating them to be exempt from taxation by or under state authority. New York v. Commissioners of Taxes of City and County of New York, 71 U. S. (4 Wall.) 244, 258, 18 L. Ed. 344; Wright v. Stolz, 27 Ind. 338; Bradley v. Illinois, 71 U. S. (4 Wall.) 459, 462, 18 L. Ed. 433.

There is a clear and well-understood distinction between capital and shares of stock, so that, in returns by a bank of an assessment of so much money as capital, such sum will not be taken to mean the shares of stock of the bank. Brown v. French (U. S.) 80 Fed. 166, 168.

The capital of a bank does not include the property of a stockholder therein. The corporation is the legal owner of all the property of the bank. The interest of the shareholder entitles him to participate in the net profits earned by the bank in the employment of its capital, during the existence of its charter, in proportion to the number of its shares; and, upon its dissolution or termination to his proportion of the property that may remain of the corporation after the payment of its debts. This is a distinct, independent interest of property, held by the shareholder like any other property that may belong to him, and is not exempted by the clause of the national banking act exempting the capital of national banks from taxation by or under state authority. Van Allen v. Assessors, 70 U. S. (3 Wall.) 573, 583, 18 L. Ed. 229.

Temporary loans.

In Bailey v. Clark, 88 U. S. (21 Wall.) 284, 22 L. Ed. 651, it is held that the term "capital," in reference to banking, does not include money borrowed from time to time in the course of business. It applies only to the property or money of the banker set apart and manifestly invested in banking. St. Louis, I. M. & S. Ry. Co. v. Loftin, 30 Ark. 693, 707.

"Capital," when used with respect to the property of a corporation, has a settled meaning, and applies to the property or means contributed by the stockholders as the fund or basis for the business or enterprise for which a corporation was formed. As to them, the term does not embrace temporary loans, though the moneys borrowed be directly appropriated in their business or undertakings. When used with respect to the property of individuals in any particular business, the term has the same import, and means the property taken from other investments, or used and set apart for and invested in the special business, and in the increased proceeds or earnings of which property, beyond expenditures incurred in its use, consist the profits made in the business. Bailey v. Clark, 88 U. S. (21 Wall.) 284, 287, 22 L. Ed. 651.

CAPITAL CRIME OR OFFENSE.

A capital crime is one for which the punishment of death is inflicted. Walker v. State, 13 S. W. 860, 28 Tex. App. 503.

A capital offense in the sense that a person is bailable, except for a capital offense, is an offense which is punishable—that is to say, liable to punishment—by death. Ex parte Dusenberry, 11 S. W. 217, 97 Mo. 504.

The expression "capital offense," as used in Bill of Rights, § 11, providing that all prisoners shall be bailable by sufficient sureties, unless for capital offenses, is one for which the highest penalty is death. Murder in the first degree is therefore a capital offense. But since a person who commits murder in the first degree before he arrives at the age of 17 years cannot be punished by death, a person under the age of 17 years, charged with the commission of the crime of murder in the first degree, is entitled to bail. Walker v. State, 28 Tex. App. 503, 504, 13 S. W. 860.

The term includes a crime which may be punished, in the discretion of the jury, with the penalty of death; and, though the power conferred on the jury of deciding whether or not a homicide shall be punished capitally undoubtedly increases the chances of the murderer to escape capital punishment, yet, until he is tried, the offense, in law and in the eye of the Constitution, is as much capital as it was before such power was conferred on juries. Ex parte McCrary, 22 Ala. 65, 72.

CAPITAL EMPLOYED.

See, also, "Employed."

The words "capital employed" and "full sum invested," as used in Loc. Laws 1847, p. 82, § 23, providing that, when the amount of dividends declared by a railroad corporation shall amount to the full sum invested, the Legislature may fix rates, so that not more than 15 per cent. shall be divided on the capital employed, embraces only such sums as were contributed directly by those who purchased the corporate stock for the construction of the road, and the sum paid for bonds that were issued for its construction, and subsequently converted into shares of stock. It was the money put in that made profits and dividends possible. In popular sense, the "full sum invested" and "capital employed," which are clearly used as synonymous terms, usually mean an original sum placed on a venture, with a view to profits or income. Terre Haute & I. R. Co. v. State, 65 N. E. 401, 407, 159 Ind. 438.

CAPITAL INVESTED.

Money which a partner loaned to the firm, and on which he received such profits as were earned by the firm, is capital invested, within the meaning of the transfer tax, rendering such capital subject to a tax on the death of the partner. In re Probst's Estate, 82 N. Y. Supp. 396, 397, 40 Misc. Rep. 431.

CAPITAL STOCK.

"Capital stock," as used in Laws 1880, c. 542, as subsequently amended before 1896, requiring certain corporations to estimate and appraise the capital stock upon which no dividend has been declared, for the purposes of taxation, means the corporation's assets after deducting its liabilities and adding to the sum then remaining the value of the good will of the business, including its right of conducting it under its franchise. The contention that the liabilities of the corporation will not, in such case, be deducted from its assets, cannot be sustained. The term or phrase "capital stock" has been several times defined, and a distinction between capital stock and shares of stock held by stockholders has been pointed out, as can be seen in the cases of Williams v. Western Union Tel. Co., 93 N. Y. 162, 188; Canfield v. Morristown Fire Ass'n, 23 N. J. Law (3 Zab.) 195, 197; Burrall v. Bushwick R. Co., 75 N. Y. 211, 216; Barry v. Merchants' Exchange Co. (N. Y.) 1 Sandf. Ch. 280; People v. Wemple, 150 N. Y. 46, 51, 44 N. E. 787; People v. Roberts, 47 N. E. 980, 982, 154 N. Y. 101.

"An interesting description of this term 'stock,' or 'capital stock,' and what it may mean, is found in the case of People v. Coleman, 27 N. E. 818, 126 N. Y. 433, 12 L. R. A. 762. We make the following extract: 'The capital stock of a corporation is one thing, and that of the stockholder is another and a different thing. That of the company is simply its capital, existing in money or property, or both, while that of the stockholder is representative, not merely of that existing and tangible capital, but also of surplus, of dividend-earning power of franchise, and the good will of an established and prosperous business. * * * The word 'stock' is used by legislators and by different juridical writers and courts in several different senses, and its particular meaning must generally be determined by the matter in hand, the thing in the mind of the legislator or the court, the context as well as the clause wherein it may be found.' Under Gen. St. § 4079, requiring the board of valuation to fix the value of the capital stock of a corporation, and to deduct from the amount thus fixed the assessed value of the tangible property assessed in the state or county wherein situated, and making the balance thus found the value of its corporate franchise subject to taxation, etc., the Legislature meant to include by the term "capital stock" the entire property, real and personal, tangible and intangible, assets on hand, and its franchise, as well. Henderson Bridge Co. v. Commonwealth, 31 S. W. 486, 489, 491, 99 Ky. 623, 17 Ky. Law Rep. 389, 394, 29 L. R. A. 73.

"Capital stock" does not mean shares of stock only, but the aggregate capital of a corporation, which includes the value of the right to use any tangible property in a special manner for purposes of gain. Indianapolis & St. L. R. Co. v. Vance, 96 U. S. 450, 455, 24 L. Ed. 752.

"Capital stock" of a corporation in its most comprehensive sense, includes its property, corporeal and incorporeal, and all the rights and franchises, of the corporation. A corporation may have a capital or capital stock before it confers shares in it on persons, and in such case the capital or capital stock is the legal faculty and practicability to dispose of shares of it to individuals in a proper manner for corporate purposes. Williams v. Western Union Tel. Co., 48 N. Y. Super. Ct. (16 Jones & S.) 349, 368.

As a general proposition, the exemption of the capital stock of a company from taxation exempts the property in reference to which that stock exists, for the plain and simple reason that the stock, when considered independent of that property, is nothing more than a valueless piece of paper. The property is the representative of the stock; the stock, the representative of the property; and, as things of value and interest, they are the same. Yet, where the Legislature provided that the capital stock of a railroad company should be forever exempt from taxation, and that all the property of the road should be exempt for 35 years after completion, the effect of such provision is to prohibit taxation of the stock as stock of the company, but after the expiration of 35 years the property might be taxed by some other rule than by taxing its stock as stock. Atlantic & G. R. Co. v. Allen, 15 Fla. 637, 660.

"Capital stock," as used in Civ. Code Cal. § 309, providing that the directors of a corporation must not make dividends from the surplus profits arising from the business thereof, and for violation the directors are personally liable to the value of the capital stock so divided, means the actual property of the corporation contributed by the shareholders of the nominal capital. Excelsior Water & Mining Co. v. Pierce, 27 Pac. 44, 46, 90 Cal. 131.

"Capital stock" may be defined as that money or property which is put into a single corporation by those who by subscriptions thereto become members of the corporate body. When used in reference to a partnership, "capital stock" means the fund of money or property which is employed as a basis of the business, and on which and with which the business is to be commenced and carried on. City and County of San Francisco v. Spring Valley Waterworks, 68 Cal. 524, 530.

The terms "capital stock" and "shares of capital stock," whenever used in the chapter relating to the revenue, shall be held to mean and include the capital stock of every association, corporation, joint-stock, or other company, the stock or capital of which is or may be divided into shares which are transferable by the owner, for the taxation of the capital stock of which association, corporation, joint-stock, or other company no special provision is made by the chapter, held by persons residing in the state, either for themselves, or as guardians, executors, administrators, trustees, or agents. Rev. St. Mo. 1899, § 9123.

The term "capital stock," as used in Illinois revenue act in force July 1, 1872 (section 32), requiring that companies and associations incorporated under the laws of Illinois, other than banks, shall, in addition to the other property required by the act to be listed, make out and deliver to the assessor a sworn statement of the amount of its capital stock, etc., means all the property belonging to a corporation, whether tangible or intangible, and of whatever nature or kind, and it must be valued under this designation for the purpose of taxation. Pacific Hotel Co. v. Lieb, 83 Ill. 602, 610.

Accumulated earnings.

A bequest of certain shares of the capital stock of a corporation to testator's wife for her use and benefit for life, with the remainder over to his children, was construed to include accumulated surplus earnings actually used in the business, and distributed among the stockholders as additional stock. Such stock is not income, and therefore belongs to the remainderman, as against the life tenant. Chester v. Buffalo Car Mfg. Co., 75 N. Y. Supp. 428, 70 App. Div. 443.

The capital stock of a corporation, which is deemed a trust fund for the payment of the corporate debts, includes the entire sum agreed to be contributed towards the enterprise by the shareholders, whether actually paid in or not, but it does not include additions made from profits realized from the business. Reid v. Eatonton Mfg. Co., 40 Ga. 98, 103, 2 Am. Rep. 563.

As authorized amount.

The capital stock of a corporation is the sum fixed by the charter as the amount paid in or to be paid in by the stockholders for the prosecution of the business of the corporation, and for the benefit of the creditors of the corporation. Cook, Stock & Stockholders, § 3. The term is so used in Act April 18, 1884, as amended by Act March 17, 1892, authorizing the taxation of the capital stock of corporations. American Pig Iron Storage Co. v. State Board of Assessors, 29 Atl. 160, 161, 56 N. J. Law (27 Vroom) 389 (quoted and approved in Cooke v. Marshall, 43 Atl. 314, 316, 191 Pa. 315).

Capital stock is the sum fixed by corporate charters as the amount paid for or to be paid for by the stockholders for the prosecution of the business of the corporation, and for the benefit of the corporation's creditors. Capital stock is to be clearly distinguished from the amount of property possessed by the corporation. At common law the capital stock does not vary, but remains fixed, although the actual property of the corporation may fluctuate widely in value, and may be diminished by loss or may be increased by gains. Collectively the capital stock is the property of the corporation, while the ownership of the shares is in the shareholder. Sale and disposal by the several owners is free and untrammelled, save as the laws or by-laws of the corporation may have prescribed rules. Not so the capital stock. That is a security or pledge the law exacts as a condition on which it grants the corporation franchise—the right to incur liability, in the discharge of which no responsibility rests on any special person. The capital stock is a trust fund—a trust for the benefit and security of the corporation's creditors. Commercial Fire Ins. Co. v. Board of Revenue of Montgomery County, 14 South. 490, 491, 99 Ala. 1, 42 Am. St. Rep. 17.

The capital stock of a corporation is the aggregate amount of the funds of the corporation which are combined together under a charter for the attainment of some common object of public convenience or private utility. The capital stock of a corporation, like that of a limited partnership or joint-stock company, is the amount fixed on by the partners or associates as their stake in the concern. Hightower v. Thornton, 8 Ga. 486, 499, 52 Am. Dec. 412.

The words "stock" and "capital stock" may be defined as meaning the fund or property belonging to a firm or corporation, and used to carry on its business. This is contributed by those who embark in the business. The articles of copartnership or the charter of the corporation fix the maximum amount of stock that may be issued, and this may properly be spoken of as the proposed or authorized capital of the company. Commonwealth v. Lehigh Ave. Ry. Co., 18 Atl. 498, 499, 129 Pa. 405, 5 L. R. A. 367.

As amount subscribed.

The capital stock is that money or property which is put into a single corporate fund by those who by subscription therefor become members of the corporate body. That fund becomes the property of the aggregate body alone, and the shareholder of the capital stock has a right to partake, according to the amount put into the fund, in the surplus profits of the corporation, and ultimately on the dissolution of it, in so much of the fund thus created as remains unimpaired, and is not liable for the debts of the corporation. Burrall v. Bushwick R. Co., 75 N. Y. 211, 216.

The capital stock of a corporation consists of the property and money subscribed and paid in for the purpose of carrying on its business. It constitutes a corporate fund belonging to the corporate body. Jones v. Davis, 35 Ohio St. 474, 476.

"The capital stock of a bank is the whole, undivided fund paid in by the stockholders, the legal right to which is vested in the corporation, to be used and managed in trust for the benefit of the members." Union Bank v. State, 17 Tenn. (9 Yerg.) 490, 498.

The term "capital stock" has a fixed and definite meaning, and designates the amount of capital contributed by the stockholders for the use of the company. Belvidere Bank v. Tunis, 23 N. J. Law (3 Zab.) 546, 548.

"Capital stock," as used in an act of incorporation, means the amount contributed or advanced by the stockholders or members of the company, and does not refer to value of the property of the company. Cantfield v. Morristown Fire Ass'n, 23 N. J. Law (3 Zab.) 195, 197.

The term "capital stock," in a charter of a railroad company, exempting its capital stock from taxation, means the capital to be raised by stock subscriptions, and does not include the land granted by Congress to aid in the construction of the road. St. Louis, I. M. & S. Ry. v. Loftin, 30 Ark. 693, 707.

The capital stock of a corporation is, like that of a copartnership or joint-stock company, the amount which the partners or associates put in as their stake in the concern. To this they add, upon the credit of the company, from the means and resources of others, to such extent as their own prudence or the confidence of such other persons will permit. Such additions create debt, but do not form capital. Where the capital stock of a corporation was limited to $1,000,000, the limitation did not restrict the corporation from laying out $2,000,000 in the site and the erection of buildings, nor from incurring debts on its bonds and mortgages for the excess of the cost beyond the capital stock. Barry v. Merchants' Exch. Co. (N. Y.) 1 Sandf. Ch. 280, 307.

"Capital stock," as used in Acts 1853, c. 502, § 2, requiring the redeeming stockholders of a railroad company to pay to the purchasers or mortgagees a sum equal to such proportion of the price paid on such sale, and the costs and expenses thereof, as such stockholders having stock in said company shall bear to the whole "capital stock" of the company, means the capital stock which has been actually subscribed for and issued, and not the amount named in the articles of association. Pratt v. Munson (N. Y.) 17 Hun, 475, 476.

The capital stock of a corporation is the aggregate sum subscribed and paid in, or to be paid in, by the shareholders, with the additional profits on the residue after the deduction of losses. A tax on property belonging to a company is not a tax on capital stock. Wilmington Underwriters' Ins. Co. v. Stedman, 41 S. E. 279, 280, 130 N. C. 221.

The capital stock of a corporation other than a mining corporation is the amount of money paid or promised to be paid for the purposes of the corporation. It is a fixed sum, not to be increased or diminished except in the mode permitted by statute. Thompson v. Reno Sav. Bank, 7 Pac. 68, 69, 19 Nev. 103, 3 Am. St. Rep. 797.

The capital stock of a corporation consists of the sums due by virtue of the subscriptions, or collected from the subscribers and invested for the corporation's benefit. State v. Norwich & W. R. Co., 30 Conn. 290, 296.

As assets.

The capital stock of a corporation, within the rule that such capital stock is a trust fund for the benefit of the general creditors, must mean the assets of the corporation, unless it be confined to the unpaid subscriptions to the capital stock, since all actual payments on account of capital stock do at once mingle with the other moneys of the company, and lose all earmarks and distinction in the mass of general assets. Landis v. Sea Isle City Hotel Co. (N. J.) 31 Atl. 755, 764.

The word "capital," used as measuring a figurative ownership of the stockholders in the property of a corporation, means that part of the company's assets which would be divided among the shareholders in case of dissolution; that is to say, the assets representing the amount of the original capital and profits in excess of existing debts. In re Batterson, 44 Atl. 546, 547, 72 Conn. 374.

Bank building.

The capital stock of a bank is all the property of every kind, whether in the form of money, bills of exchange, or any other property in possession, or anything into which the money originally contributed has been changed, or which it has produced. Hence, where the capital stock of a bank was exempted from taxation by its charter, its banking house was equally exempt, with every other part of its capital; and even though, in violation of its charter, the bank erected a building not needed for banking purposes, the building was not for that reason liable to taxation, though the bank might be proceeded against by the state for violation of its charter. Town of New Haven v. City Bank of New Haven, 31 Conn. 106, 111.

The capital stock of a corporation is usually the representative of its property, and the property the representative of the capital stock. Nevertheless the charter of a bank, providing that the payment of a tax of a certain per cent. on each share of its capital stock should be in lieu of all other taxes, did not exempt the bank from the payment of a tax on a portion of its banking house used otherwise than as its place of business, or on other real estate held by it in excess of that which the charter permitted it to hold. Bank of Commerce v. McGowan, 74 Tenn. (6 Lea) 703, 706.

Bank stock distinguished.

See "Bank Stock."

As capital.

See, also, "Capital."

As used in Acts 1853, § 13, speaking of capital stock, and forbidding its withdrawal by or payment to the stockholders, it includes the capital of the corporation, on which it transacts business, where such capital consists of money, property, or other valuable commodities. Martin v. Zellerbach, 38 Cal. 300, 309, 99 Am. Dec. 365, 366 (approved in City and County of San Francisco v. Spring Valley Waterworks, 63 Cal. 524, 531).

Capital distinguished.

See, also, "Capital."

The capital stock of a corporation, strictly speaking, is the money contributed by the incorporators to the capital, and is usually represented by shares issued to subscribers of the stock on the initiation of the corporate enterprise. "Capital stock" is often used interchangeably with the word "capital" to express the true meaning of that word, to wit, the property and assets of the corporation; but the word "capital" is a more extensive term than "capital stock," including all of the funds, securities, credits, and property of whatever kind possessed by a corporation. Christensen v. Eno, 12 N. E. 648, 649, 106 N. Y. 97, 60 Am. Rep. 429.

Strictly speaking, capital stock in a corporation or association is quite different from capital of either, the one referring to the tangible, and the other to rights in property evidenced, in case of a corporation, by certificates of stock. But the terms are used interchangeably and synonymously in laws and decisions. The term "capital" as accurately described the intangible property rights of members of an unincorporated association engaged in the business of banking in the property of the association as the term "capital stock." State v. Lewis, 95 N. W. 388, 390, 118 Wis. 432.

There is a distinction between the capital and the capital stock of a corporation. The capital of a corporation is the property or means which the corporation owns, and it may vary in amount, while the capital stock is fixed, and represents the interest of the stockholders, and is their property. Wells v. Green Bay & M. Canal Co., 64 N. W. 69, 72, 90 Wis. 442.

"Capital" and "capital stock" are, in legal intendment, synonymous, and are used in legislative acts as equivalent terms, though strictly not of the same meaning. "Capital stock" means not shares of stock, either separately or in the aggregate, but is intended to designate the property of the corporation subject to taxation, not in separate parcels, but in a homogeneous unity. Foster v. Stevens, 22 Atl. 78, 79, 63 Vt. 175, 13 L. R. A. 168.

Act Dec. 11, 1845, providing that the capital stock of a certain railroad company shall be forever exempt from taxation, is to be construed as meaning the stock issued by the corporation, which, "when subscribed and paid for, furnished the corporation with capital to build its road." It is distinguished from capital, and the statute does not exempt the capital of the road from taxation. Tennessee v. Whitworth, 6 Sup. Ct. 645, 649, 117 U. S. 129, 29 L. Ed. 830.

"Capital stock" is synonymous with "capital," and is part of the property vesting in the corporation in its corporate capacity. A fund consisting of unearned premiums held by a fidelity insurance company as a reinsurance reserve fund is a part of its capital, and is taxable under Laws 1896, § 908, providing for the taxation of the capital stock of every company. People v. Feitner, 65 N. Y. Supp. 523, 524, 31 Misc. Rep. 433.

"Capital stock" and "capital" are synonymous terms. In this general sense, it is money invested in business operations, whether that business be conducted by a single individual, a partnership, a corporation, or a government; and it makes no difference how the money is obtained—whether by labor, by borrowing, or otherwise. If the money is borrowed, it is represented in the hands of the lender by bonds, notes, or other papers; with the government, by governmental securities, sometimes called "stocks." But in such cases the lender is not a stockholder in the business. So far as the party himself is concerned, if the money borrowed or otherwise obtained is invested in his business it is capital or stock in trade. This is the general meaning of the term. But when it is used in connection with a chartered or joint stock company made up of individuals, it has a somewhat more limited signification. It means then the money advanced by the corporators or members as the capital, which is usually, for convenience, divided into equal amounts, called "shares," for which each member is entitled to a certificate showing the number of shares which he has in the company, or, in other words, the amount of money he has furnished to the common stock, which certificate is the evidence of his being a stockholder. State v. Cheraw & C. R. Co., 16 S. C. 524, 528.

"Capital stock," as used in Civ. Code, § 309, providing that the directors of corporations must not make dividends, except from the surplus profits arising from the business, and must not divide or pay to the stockholders any part of the capital stock, is frequently otherwise and as well expressed by the simple word "capital," and means the money and property with which the company carries on its corporate business. Kohl v. Lillenthal, 22 Pac. 689, 691, 81 Cal. 378, 6 L. R. A. 520.

The word "capital," in relation to the taxation of corporations, has a well-defined meaning, for it and capital stock are used indiscriminately to designate the estate of the corporation. Comstock, J., in People v. Com'rs of Taxes, 23 N. Y. 192, cited and approved in People v. Coleman, 126 N. Y. 433, 27 N. E. 818, 12 L. R. A. 762. Thus, in a statement by the corporation that its capital is worth par, and a certain amount of its capital stock has been paid in, such statement is equivalent to saying that the estate of the company is worth the amount of money paid in. People v. Barker, 26 N. Y. Supp. 971, 972, 75 Hun, 6.

The phrase "capital stock of a corporation" is sometimes used to mean the company's capital existing in money or property or both, and sometimes to mean the shareholders' stock, which is representative not merely of the existing and tangible property of the company, but also of its surplus, its dividend earning power, and its franchise and good will, as an established business. Within the tax law taxing the capital stock of corporations, it is used in the first sense. People v. Pond, 57 N. Y. Supp. 490, 493, 37 App. Div. 330.

As capital paid in.

"Capital," as employed in the charter of a railroad company which provided that, when the dividends exceeded 6 per cent. per annum on the capital stock, 6 per cent. of the dividends should be paid to a city, meant the capital paid in, and not the authorized capital. City of Philadelphia v. Philadelphia & G. F. Pass. Ry. Co., 52 Pa. (2 P. F. Smith) 177, 180.

"Capital stock," as used in a statute which requires a certain per cent. to be paid annually on the capital stock of a bank, in lieu of any other taxation, is the amount of funds paid in by the stockholders to be used by the banking association for banking purposes. State Bank v. City of Milwaukee, 18 Wis. 281, 284.

The words "stock" and "capital stock" may be defined as meaning the fund or property belonging to a firm or corporation, and used to carry on its business, whether it be for the purpose of adjusting and paying dividends to stockholders, or of regulating the amount of taxes, or of incurring a liability upon the basis of its capital stock, as authorized by law. The rights of the corporation must be measured not by nominal or authorized capital, but by the actual amount of capital paid in. Appeal of Commonwealth, 24 Wkly. Notes Cas. 530, 533, 129 Pa. 405, 18 Atl. 498, 5 L. R. A. 367.

The capital stock of a bank consists originally of the money paid in by the subscribers to the stock of the bank. This money changes its form, and is represented by notes of other persons; but it is held that in this form it is still capital stock, and therefore is to be exempt from taxation under a provision of the charter that the capital stock of the bank is not taxable for municipal purposes. Town of Connersville v. Bank of State, 16 Ind. 105.

"Capital stock," as used in Act Assem. March, 1872, entitled an "Act relating to the Ridge Avenue Railway Company" (section 3), providing that the company shall annually pay into the treasury of the city of Philadelphia, for the use of the city, a tax of 6 per cent. upon so much of any dividend declared which may exceed 6 per cent. upon their capital stock, means the capital stock which has been paid in, and not the capital stock subscribed for. City of Philadelphia v. Ridge Ave. Pass. Ry. Co., 102 Pa. 190, 193.

Franchises.

The term "capital stock," as used in the statute providing for the taxation of the capital stock of a corporation, is, as has been said, a business photograph of all the corporate possessions and possibilities, and represents its business opportunities and capabilities, as well as its tangible assets that enter into and go to make up the value of the stock. It is well settled that franchises, although neither visible nor tangible, are property, which may be taxed the same as any other property. State v. Duluth Gas & Water Co., 78 N. W. 1032, 1033, 76 Minn. 96, 57 L. R. A. 63.

The capital stock of a corporation represents not only the tangible property, but also the intangible, including therein all corporate franchises and all contract privileges and good will of the concern. Henderson Bridge Co. v. Negley, 63 S. W. 989, 990, 23 Ky. Law Rep. 746 (citing Henderson Bridge Co. v.

Commonwealth, 31 S. W. 486, 99 Ky. 623, 17 Ky. Law Rep. 389, 29 L. R. A. 73).

Furniture and rental of office.

The rental of an office and the value of office furniture of a manufacturing corporation do not constitute capital stock separate from that used in the business of manufacturing, as such office and furniture are merely incidents to such business, and the amount so used, therefore, was not taxable as capital stock. People ex rel. Standard Wood Co. v. Roberts, 47 N. Y. Supp. 122, 123, 20 App. Div. 514.

As property belonging to corporation.

In Pacific Hotel Co. v. Lieb, 83 Ill. 602, the court say: "The words 'capital stock,' as used in the revenue law, we have held, in Porter v. Rockford, R. I. & St. L. R. Co., 78 Ill. 561, and in other subsequent cases where the question has been before us, mean the property belonging to the corporation; and we have also held in those cases that it was designed by the law that all that belongs to the corporation as its property, whether tangible or intangible, of whatever nature or kind, should be valued, under this designation, for the purpose of taxation. State Board of Equalization v. People, 81 N. E. 339, 346, 191 Ill. 528, 58 L. R. A. 513.

The words "capital stock," in a law taxing a capital stock of a corporation, are intended to include all of the property of the corporation, and to have all of the property valued as an entirety. Western Union Tel. Co. v. Norman (U. S.) 77 Fed. 13, 22.

Within the provisions of Laws 1857, c. 456, § 3, providing that the capital stock of every company shall be assessed at its actual value, etc., the term "capital stock" denotes property owned by the corporation, and not the par or actual value of the shares issued to or held by its stockholders. People v. Coleman, 126 N. Y. 433, 27 N. E. 818, 12 L. R. A. 762. Neither par nor the actual value of all the shares issued by the corporation is necessarily the measure of the actual value of its capital—that is, property—but such value is to be ascertained by evidence and inquiry. People v. Barker, 25 N. Y. Supp. 340, 342, 72 Hun, 126.

Capital stock is the sum fixed by the corporate charter as the amount paid in or to be paid for by the stockholders for the prosecution of the business of the corporation, and for the benefit of the corporate creditors. The capital stock is to be clearly distinguished from the amount of property possessed by the corporation. While occasionally it happens that, under the terms of statutes pertaining to taxation, which have been drawn without regard to the technical meaning of the words, the court will construe all the actual property of the corporation to be capital stock, it is for the purpose of carrying out the intention of the statute, and is not the real meaning of the terms. At common law the capital stock does not vary, but remains firm, although the actual property of the corporation may fluctuate widely in value, and may be diminished by loss or increased by gains; hence the term "capital stock paid in" means the entire capital and available assets of a company. Tradesman Pub. Co. v. Knoxville Car Wheel Co., 32 S. W. 1097, 1101, 95 Tenn. (11 Pickle) 634, 31 L. R. A. 593, 49 Am. St. Rep. 943.

"'Capital stock' does not mean the identical lands, chattels, or other articles of property possessed by a corporation, nor shares of stock either separately or in the aggregate, but is intended to designate the property of the corporation subject to taxation, not in separate parcels, but as a homogeneous unit, partaking of the nature of personality, and subject to the burdens imposed upon it at the domicile of the owner." Quincy R. Bridge Co. v. Adams County, 88 Ill. 615, 621.

The word "stock" has various significations, but, as applied to joint-stock companies or corporations, it means the property and franchises of the company. It is sometimes used to designate the certificate or scrip issued to the stockholders, but this is an inappropriate use of the word. Williams v. Western Union Tel. Co., 48 N. Y. Super. Ct. (16 Jones & S.) 349, 367.

The phrase "capital stock," within the meaning of Rev. St. § 2746, providing that no person shall be required to list for taxation any share or shares of the capital stock of any company, the capital stock of which is taxed in the name of such company, embraces the entire corporate property. If any part of the corporate property is not taxed within the state, the owners of shares of its stock who are residents of this state are not exempt by virtue of the provisions of that section from listing those shares for taxation in this state and paying taxes thereon; the exemption applying only in cases where the capital stock, i. e. all the corporate property, has been taxed within this state. Hubbard v. Brush, 55 N. E. 829, 830, 61 Ohio St. 252 (citing Lee v. Sturges, 46 Ohio St. 153, 19 N. E. 560, 2 L. R. A. 556; Sturges v. Carter, 114 U. S. 511, 512, 5 Sup. Ct. 1014, 29 L. Ed. 240).

"The term 'capital stock' means all the property and rights of the corporation, of every kind and nature, wherever located." Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Weber, 96 Ill. 443, 448.

Real estate.

In the case of a bank, which can be the owner of real estate only in a few cases, which are enumerated in its charter, any such real estate that it may thus own must be a part of its capital stock. Any property of the company, whether it be land or promissory notes or specie, which they acquire and hold under the authority of their charter, is a part of their stock; and where the law provides for the taxation of a bank by the levy of the tax on the capital stock, an additional tax levied on its real estate is void. State Bank v. Breckenridge (Ind.) 7 Blackf. 395, 397.

Real estate within the state, purchased by a foreign corporation with surplus earnings, and not occupied by it, but leased, is not a portion of its capital stock employed within the state, the basis for taxation of a foreign corporation under Laws 1880, c. 542. People v. Wemple, 44 N. E. 787, 150 N. Y. 46.

As shares of stock.

See, also, "Capital"; "Share of Stock."

The words "capital stock," in Laws 1896, c. 908, § 182, authorizing the imposition of a franchise tax on such portion of the capital stock at par of the corporations as the amount of the capital employed within the state bears to the entire capital of the corporation, means share stock. People v. Roberts, 72 N. Y. Supp. 950, 952, 66 App. Div. 157.

"Capital stock," within the meaning of the exemption from taxation to a railroad corporation of its capital stock, covers the individual interest therein of the stockholders, and therefore a subsequent law imposing a tax on the shares owned by them impairs an obligation on the contract created by the charter giving the exemption. Tennessee v. Whitworth (U. S.) 22 Fed. 75, 76.

"Capital stock" means all the capital of a corporation, including both its shares of stock and its corporeal property. People v. Chicago Gas Trust Co., 22 N. E. 798, 803, 130 Ill. 268, 8 L. R. A. 497, 17 Am. St. Rep. 319.

"Capital stock," as used in the articles of incorporation of a gas company, giving it power to purchase, hold, or sell the capital stock of any other company or companies, should be construed to include shares of stock, though there is a distinction, under certain circumstances and for certain purposes, between capital stock and shares of stock; capital stock meaning the entire property owned by the corporation, while a share in the stock is the right to partake, according to the amount put into the fund, of the surplus profit obtained for the use and disposal of the capital stock of the company to those purposes for which the company is constituted. The capital stock of a corporation is that which consists of, or may be divided into, shares; hence the capital stock of any gas company may be regarded as the aggregate of all the shares of such stock. People v. Chicago Gas Trust Co., 22 N. E.

798, 799, 130 Ill. 268, 8 L. R. A. 497, 17 Am. St. Rep. 319.

"Capital stock," as used in the Revised Laws of Kentucky, providing for the taxation of capital stock of banks and other corporations, means the value of the shares of its capital stock. First Nat. Bank v. Stone (U. S.) 88 Fed. 409, 411.

The term "capital stock," when applied to a national bank, is sometimes used to designate the aggregate of the shares of stock issued by the bank. It is a different thing from the moneyed capital of the bank, held and owned by the corporation. First Nat. Bank v. Kentucky, 76 U. S. (9 Wall.) 353, 359, 19 L. Ed. 701.

The phrase "capital stock" is used in various senses. Strictly, it is the authorized capital actually subscribed; loosely, it is the fund paid in; still more loosely, it is the capital of the corporation, whether in money or property; and again, popularly, it is the aggregate of the stock made up of the shares of the stockholders. And where by charter a railroad's capital stock is forever exempted from taxation, and the road, with its fixtures, appurtenances, etc., became liable to taxation upon the expiration of 20 years, it being evident that the terms there used did not include the property of the road, it would seem that it was used in the sense of the aggregate of stock made up of the shares of the stockholders. Memphis & C. R. Co. v. Gaines, 3 Tenn. Ch. 604, 616.

The words "capital stock," as used in section 182 of the tax law, providing for a tax on the capital stock of corporations, refer to the capital or property of the corporation, and not to the share stock. In the case of a domestic corporation, the purpose is to tax that intangible property belonging to it, which is frequently of great value, and rests wholly in its right to exist and carry on business. People v. Knight, 77 N. Y. Supp. 398, 399, 75 App. Div. 164.

Shares of stock distinguished.

See, also, "Capital"; "Share of Stock."

The capital stock and the shares of the capital stock of a corporation are distinct things. The capital stock is the money paid or authorized or required to be paid in as the basis of the business of the corporation, and the means of conducting its operations. It represents whatever it may be invested in. The shares of the capital stock are usually represented by certificates. Every holder is a cestui que trust, to the extent of his ownership. The shares are held and may be bought and sold and taxed like other property. Each share represents an aliquot part of the capital stock, but the holder cannot touch a dollar of the principal. The capital stock and the shares may both be taxed.

and it is not double taxation. Farrington v. Tennessee, 95 U. S. 679, 686, 24 L. Ed. 558.

The capital stock of a bank is a different thing from the bank stock or stock owned by individuals in the bank, and therefore an exemption from taxation of the capital stock does not exempt the stock owned by individuals. "Bank stock" means the individual interest in the dividends, as they are declared, of the stockholders, and a right to pro rata distribution of the effects on hand at the expiration of the charter. The capital stock of the bank is the whole undivided fund paid in by the stockholders, the legal right to which is vested in the corporation, to be used and managed in the trust for the benefit of the members. Public Treasurer v. Petway, 55 N. C. 390, 406.

The capital stock of a corporation is the amount subscribed, and very different from the shares of the capital stock, which are the integral parts of such stock, and owned by the members in proportion to the respective amounts subscribed. Worth v. Petersburg B. Co., 89 N. C. 301, 305.

The capital stock of a corporation is a company's actual capital, paid in and possessed, which is used by it in the transaction and furtherance of its business. It is not at all or in any sense the share stock. People v. Coleman, 27 N. E. 818, 819, 126 N. Y. 433, 12 L. R. A. 762.

"Capital stock" means, not shares of stock, either separately or in the aggregate, but is intended to designate the property of the corporation subject to taxation, not in separate parcels, but in a homogeneous unity. Foster v. Stevens, 22 Atl. 78, 79, 63 Vt. 175, 13 L. R. A. 166.

"Capital stock," as used in Rev. St. c. 18, tit. 4, § 2, making it unlawful for the directors of a corporation to withdraw or in any way pay to the stockholders any part of the capital stock without the consent of the Legislature, does not mean share stock, but means the property of the corporation contributed by its stockholders, or otherwise obtained by it, to the extent required by its charter. Skinner v. Smith, 10 N. Y. Supp. 81, 86, 56 Hun, 437.

"Capital stock" is not synonymous with "shares of stock," but is a different thing, and forms a different subject of taxation. A tax on the one is not a tax on the other, nor is an exemption on the one an exemption on the other. State v. Home Ins. Co., 19 S. W. 1042, 1043, 91 Tenn. (7 Pickle) 558.

"Capital stock" means, as used in the Illinois revenue law, providing that the capital stock of corporations shall be valued at its fair cash value, not the individual shares of stock, or blocks of such shares, but the stock as an entirety—the beneficial ownership of everything that enters into the property of the corporation. The object of the statute is to reach, for the purposes of taxation, the property, tangible or intangible, of each corporation—if it be a railroad, its tracks, station houses, terminal facilities, real estate, and rolling stock, as also the opportunities, inherent in the corporation and its franchise, of creating earnings, such as the region it taps, the tonnage such region affords, the market it reaches, the advantages of its terminals, its capacities and prospects; in short, every consideration that gives it an inherent present or prospective value. Chicago Union Transfer Co. v. State Board of Equalization (U. S.) 112 Fed. 607, 611.

The term "capital stock," as used in the provisions of the statute relating to the appraisal of capital stock of a corporation for taxation, does not mean share stock, but it means the property of a corporation, contributed by its stockholders or otherwise obtained by it, to the extent required by its charter. People v. Wemple, 29 N. Y. Supp. 92, 94, 78 Hun, 63.

Capital stock and shares of stock are different things, and form different subjects of taxation. A tax upon the one is not a tax upon the other, nor is the exemption of one an exemption of the other. Thus an ad valorem tax may be levied upon the shares of stock of an insurance company, although its capital stock is exempt from taxation. State v. Home Ins. Co., 19 S. W. 1042, 1043, 91 Tenn. (7 Pickle) 558.

The capital stock of a corporation, and the shares of stock into which the stock of the corporation may be divided, and held by individual shareholders, are two distinct pieces of property; and the surplus belonging to a bank is also distinct from the capital stock, for the very word "surplus" implies difference—that is, there is a capital stock, and there is a surplus over and beyond the capital stock, which surplus is the property of the bank until it is divided among the stockholders. Bank of Commerce v. Tennessee, 16 Sup. Ct. 456, 460, 161 U. S. 134, 40 L. Ed. 645.

The phrase "capital stock," as used in a statute providing for the taxation of the capital stock of corporations, means actual, tangible property, and not its share stock, which is to be assessed at its actual value. People v. Dederick, 55 N. E. 927, 929, 161 N. Y. 195.

Surplus distinguished.

See "Surplus."

As trust fund for creditors.

"The capital stock of a moneyed corporation is a fund for the payment of its debts. It is a trust fund, of which the directors are the trustees. It is a trust to be managed for the benefit of its shareholders during its life, and for the benefit of its creditors in the event of its dissolution. Equally unsound is the opinion that the obligation of a subscriber to pay his subscriptions may be released or surrendered to him by the trustees of a company. The capital stock paid in and promised to be paid in is a fund which the trustees cannot squander or give away. They are bound to collect what is unpaid, and carefully to husband it when received." Bouton v. Dement, 14 N. E. 62, 65, 123 Ill. 142.

The capital stock of a corporation is the amount contributed or agreed to be contributed by its stockholders, and, as to creditors, is, in equity, deemed a trust fund charged with the payment of the debts of the corporation, and must be treated as such by the corporation. Farnsworth v. Robbins, 31 N. W. 349, 350, 36 Minn. 369.

The capital of a corporation is that fund to which creditors look for payment of their claims. Appeal of Cornell, 6 Atl. 253, 260, 114 Pa. 153.

"The capital stock of an incorporated company is a fund set apart for the payment of its debts. It is a substitute for the personal liability which subsists in private copartnerships." Sanger v. Upton, 91 U. S. 56, 60, 23 L. Ed. 220.

CAPITAL STOCK TAX.

A capital stock tax is a property tax, but the property of a corporation for the purpose of taxation is reached through the tax imposed directly on the stock, the value of which is ascertained in the first instance as directed by the act authorizing the tax. Commonwealth v. Pennsylvania Coal Co., 47 Atl. 740, 741, 197 Pa. 551.

CAPITATION TAX.

A capitation tax is one upon the person, simply, without any reference to his property, real or personal, or to any business in which he may be engaged, or to any employment which he may follow. It is rightfully imposed because of the protection which the government affords to the person, independent of the connection or relation of the person to anything else. Gardner v. Hall, 61 N. C. 21, 22.

A poll or capitation tax is one imposed on a person without regard to his property, business, or other circumstances. But the liability to work on highways, as imposed by statute on all able-bodied men and citizens between the ages of 21 and 50 years, is in the nature of military and jury service, rather than of a poll tax. Leedy v. Incorporated Town of Bourbon, 40 N. E. 640, 641, 12 Ind. App. 486.

A capitation tax is a tax on the poll, without regard to property, business, or other circumstances. The Head-Money Cases (U. S.) 18 Fed. 135, 139.

CAPTAIN OF THE WATCH.

The captain of the watch on a vessel is a kind of foreman or overseer, who, under the supervision of the mate, has charge of one of the two watches into which the crew is divided for the convenience of work. He calls them out and in, and directs them where to store freight, which packages to move, when to go or come ashore and generally directs their work, and is an officer, within the meaning of Rev. St. U. S. § 347, providing for the punishment of every master or other officer of any American vessel who beats, wounds, etc. United States v. Trice (U. S.) 30 Fed. 490, 491.

CAPTATION.

"Captation" is a term of the civil law, usually defined as the act of one who succeeds in controlling the will of another so as to become master of it. Captation takes place by those administrations of attachment and friendship, in whatever form evidenced, which one person uses to render himself agreeable to another and secure his good will. Zerega v. Percival, 15 South. 470, 480, 46 La. Ann. 590.

CAPTION.

Caption or otherwise, see "Otherwise."

Of indictment.

The caption of an indictment is its style, preamble, or commencement, and should describe the court before which it was found. State v. Sutton, 5 N. C. 281, 282.

The caption of an indictment was originally only a copy of the style of the court at which the indictment was found. By the strictest rule of the common law, the caption was deemed sufficient if it described with reasonable certainty the court before which the indictment was found, the time and place where it was found, and the jurors by whom it was found. Both the caption and the commencement are purely formal, and they may be amended, if faulty, by the record, in the proper manner. Beebe v. United States, 11 N. W. 505, 509, 2 Dak. 292.

The caption is no part of an indictment proper, but is merely the ministerial act of the clerk or prosecuting officer. It is therefore amendable by reference to the records of the court in which it was found. State v. Mowry, 43 Atl. 871, 873, 21 R. I. 376.

The caption of an indictment is no part of the indictment itself, since it is not presented by, or does it receive the sanction of, the grand jury, or the signature of their foreman. It is merely a history of the proceeding previous to the finding of the indictment, and sets forth the style of the court, the time and place of its session, by whom held, and their title and authority, by whom they are to inquire, the names of the grand jurors, their qualifications, whether sworn or affirmed, and, if affirmed, the reason of it, and also their presentment. State v. Jones, 9 N. J. Law (4 Halst.) 357, 365, 17 Am. Dec. 483; People v. Bennett, 37 N. Y. 117, 122, 93 Am. Dec. 551; State v. Brickell, 8 N. C. 354, 355; Mitchell v. State, 16 Tenn. (8 Yerg.) 514, 528; Ex parte Bain, 121 U. S. 1, 7, 7 Sup. Ct. 781, 785, 30 L. Ed. 849; United States v. Thompson (U. S.) 28 Fed. Cas. 98, 100; Taylor v. Smith (Tenn.) 36 S. W. 970, 976.

Of statute.

"Caption," as used in Const. art. 2, § 17, requiring all acts which amend former laws to recite in their caption or otherwise the title of the act amended, is synonymous with "title." State v. Runnels, 21 S. W. 665, 666, 92 Tenn. (8 Pickle) 320; Shelton v. State, 32 S. W. 967, 968, 96 Tenn. (12 Pickle) 521; State v. Yardley, 32 S. W. 481, 483, 95 Tenn. (11 Pickle) 546, 34 L. R. A. 656; Memphis St. R. Co. v. State, 75 S. W. 730, 733, 110 Tenn. 598 (citing State v. Runnels, 21 S. W. 665, 92 Tenn. [8 Pickle] 320).

CAPTURE.

See "Lawful Capture."

A capture is a seizure of a vessel as prize, with the intention or expectation of obtaining a condemnation. Richardson v. Maine Fire & Marine Ins. Co., 6 Mass. 102, 109, 4 Am. Dec. 92.

"Capture" is a term specially applicable to a taking by man-of-war or by privateers, and it matters not if the vessel be carried into port and condemned as a prize. Fifield v. Insurance Co., 47 Pa. (11 Wright) 166, 187, 86 Am. Dec. 523.

A capture is the taking of property by one belligerent from another. Capture is a belligerent right attached to a state of hostility, and cannot exist when hostilities have terminated. In re Whitfield, 11 Ct. Cl. 444, 456.

A capture is a taking of a vessel or cargo by the enemy as a prize in time of open war or by way of reprisal, with intent to deprive the owner of it; but usage and the course of decisions by the courts have very much widened this meaning, and it may now embrace the taking of a neutral ship and cargo by a belligerent jure belli; also the forcible taking of a vessel by a friendly power in time of peace, and even by the government itself to which the assured belongs. Mauran v. Alliance Ins. Co., 73 U. S. (6 Wall.) 1, 10, 18 L. Ed. 836.

The capture by a privateer, in commission under the government of the so-called Confederate States, of an insured vessel, does not render the insurers liable upon the policy, wherein liability for "loss by seizure, capture, or detention or the consequences of any attempt thereat," was excepted. Fifield v. Insurance Co., 47 Pa. (11 Wright) 166, 176, 86 Am. Dec. 523.

A capture is when a vessel is taken as a prize of war, in a spirit of depredation, with a design to deprive the owner of it. The taking may be either by way of reprisals, or by pirates, and, by the weight of authority, a capture is broad enough to include a taking by pirates. Marsh. Ins. 422. Dole v. New England Mut. Marine Ins. Co. (U. S.) 7 Fed. Cas. 837, 852. See, also, Dole v. New England Mut. Marine Ins. Co., 88 Mass. (6 Allen) 373, 387; Dole v. Merchants' Mut. Marine Ins. Co., 51 Me. 465, 476.

In point of law, nothing more is necessary, to constitute a capture, than an intention to capture, followed up by an actual or constructive possession of the property. Force and violence or physical support are not required. It is sufficient that there be a dedito or submission on the one side, and an asserted possession on the other. The Alexander (U. S.) 1 Fed. Cas. 357, 360.

The terms "prize" and "capture" as used in Act Cong. Aug. 16, 1861, declaring private property used in promoting insurrections to be the lawful subject of prize and capture, were not employed in their technical sense of property taken at sea, but property found on shore, or even land, might be condemned under the act. United States v. Athens Armory (U. S.) 24 Fed. Cas. 878, 880; Union Ins. Co. v. United States, 73 U. S. (6 Wall.) 759, 763, 18 L. Ed. 879.

"Capture" and "prize" are not convertible terms, and, for the subject of capture to be made prize for the benefit of the captors, the taking must meet the conditions imposed by the United States statute entitled "Prize." United States v. Dewey, 23 Sup. Ct. 415, 417, 188 U. S. 254, 47 L. Ed. 463.

The word "capture," in the law of marine insurance, means a seizure as prize, with the intent or expectation of obtaining a condemnation. Richardson v. Maine Fire & Marine Ins. Co., 6 Mass. 102, 109, 4 Am. Dec. 92.

A policy of marine insurance provided that, in case of capture or detention, the assured should not have a right to abandon therefor until proof was exhibited of a condemnation, or of a continuance of the detention by capture or other arrest at least 90 days. The vessel was seized while on an illicit voyage. Held, that the words "capture," "detention," etc., meant illegal arrest, seizure, etc., and could not be extended to recover the loss sued for; the law being clearly settled that an insurance does not cover an illegal voyage unless by the terms of the contract the intention to do so is expressed, or unless the voyage insured is known to the insurer to be illegal at the time when he makes the contract. Archibald v. Mercantile Ins. Co., 20 Mass. (3 Pick.) 70, 74.

As peril of the sea.

See "Peril of the Sea."

Seizure distinguished.

A "capture," in technical language, is a taking by military power, while a seizure is a taking by civil authority. United States v. Athens Armory (U. S.) 24 Fed. Cas. 878, 880.

CAR.

See "Box Car"; "Freight Car"; "Hand Car"; "Passenger Car"; "Railroad Car"; "Refrigerator Car"; "Street Railway Cars"; "Trading Car"; "Trailer."

Other cars, see "Other."

The term "car" is generally used in this country for any wheeled vehicle used for carrying goods or passengers on a railroad, whether the road be a tramway over the streets of the city to be operated by horses, or a more extended road to be worked by steam. State v. Lang, 14 Mo. App. 247, 249.

As carriage.

See "Carriage."

Coach synonymous.

A street railroad franchise was granted on condition of the payment of an annual license fee for each car now allowed by law. At that time license fees were required, by an old ordinance, for each accommodation coach or stagecoach, and it was held that the word "car" in the franchise and the word "coach" in the ordinance both referred to a conveyance to accommodate travel, and that the city was entitled to the same license fee on a car as was fixed by the old ordinance on a coach. The court said, in definition, a "car," or "coach," or "stage," or a "stage-coach" is the same. They are vehicles that turn or that run by turning on wheels. Place boards over or between wheels, and we have a platform car adapted to freight. Place benches or chairs upon the platform, and we still have a car, but adapted to passengers, and then easily termed a "carriage." Instead of benches or chairs, put on the platform the body of a stagecoach, and we have such a railroad car as served at the inauguration of the earliest railroad in our state. It is plain that by adaptation and improvement the modern railway car has been evolved from the old-fashioned stagecoach. In common language, a railroad carriage designed for passengers is called indifferently a "coach" or "car." In every collection of words arranged according to the ideas which they express, these and others, we think, well be found classed together as having the same signification. Neither the words "coach," "stage," nor "car" can be said to be words of art, or to have any legal or fixed meaning distinguishing one from the other, or any one of them from several other terms implying a vehicle or conveyance. City of New York v. Third Ave. R. Co., 22 N. E. 755, 117 N. Y. 404, 646.

Engine and tender.

A railroad engine and its tender are one and inseparable, and, while both may properly be classed as "cars" in the construction of some statutes, it does not necessarily follow that they should be so classed in the construction of all statutes, and an engine is not a "car" within the statute providing that railroad companies shall not, under certain conditions, put in use any car not equipped with automatic couplers. Bryce v. Burlington, C. R. & N. R. Co., 93 N. W. 275, 119 Iowa, 274.

The tender of a locomotive engine engaged in interstate commerce is a "car" within the scope of the act of Congress requiring cars engaged in interstate commerce to be equipped with automatic couplers. A tender is not a locomotive engine or component part thereof, but is a small car carrying water and fuel for the engine, and to which the first passenger or freight car of the train is usually coupled. Winkler v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. (Del.) 53 Atl. 90, 92.

Express car.

An express car is a railroad car within Rev. St. § 4410, punishing the breaking and entering a railroad car with intent to commit a felony. Nicholls v. State, 68 Wis. 416, 423, 32 N. W. 543, 60 Am. Rep. 870.

Hand car.

"Car," as used in Code 1886, § 2590, subd. 5, allowing an employé to recover from his employer for personal injuries received in the employment by reason of the negligence of a co-employé having charge of the car, locomotive, etc., includes a hand car. "It is argued that, as the word 'car' is used in connection with the words 'locomotive,' 'engine,' and 'train,' it was intended to mean a vehicle used on the railway for the transportation of passengers or freight, which is propelled by a locomotive or engine, and forms a part of a train. It is true that, in determining the true sense of a word which has a variety of meanings, regard is to be had to the other words with which it is associated, and subject-matter in relation to which it is used. As the clause of the statute which is here under consideration has reference to injuries received in railway service, it seems plain that the word 'car,' as here used, does not include such vehicles moved on wheels as are not in use on railways, though there are such vehicles that properly may be called cars, and it is not difficult to select from the several definitions of the word 'car,' as found in the dictionaries, one which is applicable to the word as used in the statute. The Century Dictionary gives, among other definitions, a vehicle running upon rails. One of Webster's definitions is a vehicle adapted to the rails of a railroad." Kansas City, M. & B. R. Co. v. Crocker, 11 South. 262, 264, 95 Ala. 412.

Within the provision of a Code rendering railroad companies liable for injuries done by the running of cars, hand cars are included, as well as those propelled by steam. Thomas v. Georgia R. & Banking Co., 38 Ga. 222, 224.

Sayles' Ann. Civ. St. art. 4560f, provides that every railroad corporation shall be liable for all damages sustained by any employé thereof, while engaged in operating its cars, by reason of the negligence of any other employé, irrespective of the fact that such employés were fellow servants. In discussing the meaning of the word "car" in this statute, the court says that in common acceptation, and under the definitions, the word "car" signifies any vehicle adapted to the rails of a railroad, and would embrace in its meaning a hand car as well as a freight or passenger car, and holds that the legal representatives of a workman injured by the negligent operation of a hand car were entitled to recover. Perez v. San Antonio & A. P. Ry. Co., 67 S. W. 137, 139, 28 Tex. Civ. App. 255.

Push car.

A push car eight or ten feet long and three or four feet high, used for transporting rock down an inclined plane to a rock crusher, is a car, within Rev. St. art. 4560f, providing for recovery of damages for injuries to railroad employés while engaged in operating cars. Texas & P. R. Co. v. Webb, 72 S. W. 1044, 1045, 31 Tex. Civ. App. 498 (citing Perez v. San Antonio & A. P. Ry. Co., 67 S. W. 137, 28 Tex. Civ. App. 255).

CAR LOAD.

The meaning of the term "car load," in a contract for a certain number of car loads of brewer's rice, is to be determined in fixing the quantity of rice to be delivered by the custom of trade, in the absence of any agreement as to the quantity necessary to make a car load. Bullock v. Finley (U. S.) 28 Fed. 514, 515.

A bill of lading for lumber, describing it as a "car load," does not state the quantity of lumber, as required by Rev. St. 1879, art. 280, imposing a penalty on common carriers for refusing to give, when demanded, a bill of lading, stating the quantity of goods received for transportation. A car load of lumber is an indefinite quantity. Webster defines "quantity" as that which answers the description how much. It has the attribute of being so much, and not more or less. Texas & P. Ry. Co. v. Cuteman (Tex.) 14 S. W. 1069, 1070.

"Car loads," as used in a contract for delivery of wood, means car full; and the fact that cars vary in sizes, so that different amounts of wood would be carried on different cars, does not create such an element of uncertainty in the amount as to render the contract void for indefiniteness. Indianapolis Cabinet Co. v. Herrmann, 34 N. E. 579, 581, 7 Ind. App. 462.

As ten tons.

The term "car load," by the custom of shippers and by usage among railroads, has come to be defined as an amount of freight weighing 20,000 pounds; and hence, where a contract of shipment by rail does not define what shall constitute a car load, such general custom among railroad men and shippers will govern the contract. Goode v. Chicago. R. I. & P. Ry. Co., 60 N. W. 631, 92 Iowa, 371.

According to the construction placed upon the term "car load" by the Railroad Commissioners of Missouri, acting under Rev. St. 1879, § 833, providing for the appointment of railroad commissioners, empowered to fix maximum rates at so much per "car load," it means 10 tons. Ross v. Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. R. Co., 19 S. W. 541, 543, 111 Mo. 18; Pugh v. Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. R. Co., 24 S. W. 440, 118 Mo. 506.

A corporation commission fixed railroad freight rates for fertilizers, declaring that 20 per cent. higher rates than those fixed might be charged for shipments less than a car load, and that 10 tons should be regarded as the minimum car load. The court held that the commission's order was not ultra vires, on the ground that the commission had no power to regulate the amount of merchandise which should constitute a transportation car load, since the provisions of the order should be construed merely as determining what should amount to a car load, in determining the rate to be charged, and not as an attempt to regulate the mode of transportation, or prohibit the shipment of more than 10 tons in a car, and, in passing upon the question, said that it is common knowledge that an actual car load (that is, a car filled with one shipment) can be more cheaply and conveniently transported than one containing several shipments consigned to different persons, and perhaps at different stations. There is less handling and less risk of mistake or loss. It is probable that originally an actual car load fixed the car-load rate, but when cars became larger, and their capacity greater than the average wholesale shipment, it was deemed just and proper to fix upon an arbitrary car load as the standard of rates, in order to prevent what would otherwise amount to a large average increase. Corporation Commission v. Seaboard Air Line System, 37 S. E. 266, 268, 127 N. C. 283.

CAR PULLER.

A car puller is a device used to pull cars by means of a rope attachment hitched to cars, and operated by means of a drum or spool, around which the rope winds and unwinds; the power being supplied by machinery attached to the engine. Decatur Cereal Mill Co. v. Gogerty, 80 Ill. App. 632, 635.

CAR SERVICE.

Car service is a demurrage charge made by railroad companies of $1 per day on each car detained over 48 hours in unloading. Everingham v. Halsey, 78 N. W. 220, 221, 108 Iowa, 709.

CARBON.

Electric carbon sticks of various lengths, to be cut to required lengths, and finished for use in electric lighting, should be assessed as carbon not specially provided for, under Tariff Act 1897, p. 97. R. F. Downing & Co. v. United States (U. S.) 120 Fed. 1014.

CARBONACEOUS ANODE.

A carbonaceous anode includes anodes made partly of carbon and partly of some other substance, and covers an anode made entirely of carbon. Pittsburgh Reduction Co. v. Cowles Electric Smelting & Aluminum Co. (U. S.) 55 Fed. 301, 307.

CARBONATE OF BARYTA.

Commercial carbonate of baryta is exempt from duty under Tariff Act July 24, 1897, § 2, exempting from duty baryta, carbonate of, or witherite. Gabriel & Schall v. United States (U. S.) 121 Fed. 208.

CARCASS.

Webster defines "carcass" to be the body of an animal when dead. Whitson v. Culbertson, 7 Ind. 195, 196.

CARDINAL POINTS.

"Cardinal points," as used in an agreement that land should be surveyed in squares, to be cardinal points, should be construed in its popular meaning, as the cardinal points indicated by the magnetic needle, and not by the true meridian, which is, strictly and technically speaking, the meaning of that expression. Finnle v. Clay, 5 Ky. (2 Bibb) 351, 352.

CARDS.

Within the meaning of a statute prohibiting the "playing of games of chance or any gambling device whatever," games of chance with cards are included. "Cards" are as much a gambling device as any device yet invented. Eubanks v. State, 5 Mo. 450, 451.

CARE.

See "Adequate Care"; "All Possible Care, Skill, or Foresight"; "Due Care"; "Extraordinary Care"; "Great Care or Diligence"; "Highest Degree of Care and Diligence"; "Human Care and Foresight"; "Ordinary Care"; "Reasonable Care"; "Special Care and Diligence"; "Take Care of"; "Utmost Care"; "Want of Care."

Especial care, see "Especial."

The words "care of American Express Co.," appearing on the goods alone, and not being mentioned in the receipt given by the company, indicated merely that, if the consignee could not be found, they might be delivered into the care of the express company. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Merrill, 48 Ill. 425, 427.

Where a package is sent by express to the care of another, a delivery to such other is a compliance with the contract. Ela v. American Merchants' Union Exp. Co., 29 Wis. 611, 615, 9 Am. Rep. 619.

A bill of lading issued by defendants required the goods to be delivered as "addressed on the margin," and the margin contained the words, "G. F. W., Providence, R. I., care A. T. Co., Buffalo." Defendants contended that the words "care A. T. Co., Buffalo," which was the end of defendant's line, defined the end of their transportation contract, and that they were therefore not liable for a loss occurring in the further transportation of the goods. Held, that the address in the margin referred to required defendants to deliver the goods at Providence, R. I., and to complete the contract in connection with the A. T. Co. from Buffalo, in whose care the goods were shipped from that point, and that the contract was therefore a through contract, not limiting the carrier's liability for loss occurring on its own line. Wahl v. Holt, 26 Wis. 703, 707.

The use of the words, "In care of F. K.," in a letter directed to A., indicate that the letter is to be delivered through K. to A. United States v. Hilbury (U. S.) 29 Fed. 705.

As custody.

"Care," as used in Cr. Code, § 75, making it criminal for any employé, etc., to embezzle funds under his care and in his possession by virtue of his employment, is the equivalent of "custody," and may mean charge, safe-keeping, preservation, or security. Ker v. People, 110 Ill. 627, 649, 51 Am. Rep. 706.

A plea alleging that plaintiff had the "care, direction, and management" of a ship, which defendant was charged with having neglected to load according to contract, was construed to mean the actual care, direction, and management, and not merely the legal care, direction, and management. It is equivalent to a charge of actual bad care, direction, and management, which included such conduct on the part of the master and crew. Taylor v. Clay, 9 Q. B. 713, 723.

The "care, management, or control of any billiard table," within the meaning of a statute prohibiting any person having the care, management, and control of any billiard table from allowing minors to congregate in his place, is not shown in an indictment describing defendant as having the control and management of "said saloon, in which were kept billiard tables." Hanrahan v. State, 57 Ind. 527, 528.

As diligence.

Diligence synonymous, see "Diligence."

"Care" is undoubtedly a relative term, or, rather, conveys a relative idea as to the degree necessary to be observed under circumstances. It is different, certainly, where there is reason to apprehend danger, from that degree to be exercised when it is not to be apprehended. Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Ogier, 35 Pa. (11 Casey) 60, 68, 78 Am. Dec. 322.

"Care," like its correlative term, "negligence," is a relative term, and is to be judged by the circumstances as they exist, not as they might have existed under other and different conditions. Fox v. Oakland Consol. St. Ry., 50 Pac. 25, 47, 118 Cal. 55, 62 Am. St. Rep. 216.

"Care" is undoubtedly a relative term, or, rather, conveys a relative idea as to the degree necessary to be observed under circumstances. Smith v. Day (U. S.) 86 Fed. 62, 64 (citing Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Ogier, 35 Pa. 60, 78 Am. Dec. 322).

"Care," as used with reference to liability for personal injuries, means such care as a man of ordinary prudence and caution would exercise under similar circumstances. "Care" and "negligence" are terms entirely relative, varying in degree with every possible change of circumstances. "Ordinary care" may mean very slight care in one state of circumstances, and comparatively very great care in another. One may drive a vehicle over a country road at a rapid rate of speed, and yet be free from every imputation of negligence, while, if he drive at the same rate through the streets of a populous city, he would be guilty of the grossest want of care, yet the measure of his legal duty in each case would be the exercise of ordinary care, graduated to suit the hazards of each changing exigency. So the ordinary care which is exacted from one person in the custody of a valuable jewel is the same in legal principle as, though different in degree from, the ordinary care required from another as the custodian of a grindstone. In the one case it is the care usually taken by prudent custodians of jewels; in the other, that usually taken by prudent custodians of grindstones. Mattson v. Maupin, 75 Ala. 312, 313.

"Care," as used in reference to the rule that whoever uses a highly destructive agency is held to a correspondingly high degree of care, means more than mere mechanical skill. It includes circumspection and foresight with regard to reasonable, probable contingencies. Anderson v. Jersey City Electric Light Co., 43 Atl. 654, 655, 63 N. J. Law, 387.

"Negligence," "care," and "diligence" are more or less relative terms. They cannot always be defined arbitrarily, applicable indifferently to every state of facts. They cannot always be determined abstractly. Care and diligence must necessarily be judged of by the nature of the work to be done, the instrument to be used, the hazard and danger to life and limb from the character of the service to be performed. Carter v. Kansas City Cable Ry. Co. (U. S.) 42 Fed. 37, 38.

Care is said to be divided into three degrees: (1) Slight care; (2) ordinary care; (3) great care. Gulf, C. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Smith, 28 S. W. 520, 522, 87 Tex. 348.

Duty to repair implied.

The duty of the "care and keeping" of the schoolhouse and other property belonging to the district, imposed by statute on the school board, not merely authorizes, but requires, the board to preserve and care for the schoolhouse. This duty is not, like that of a janitor, one of personal attention and manual labor, but, like that of a trustee, one of supervision. They are not personally to sweep and dust and clean, or bring wood and make fires, but to see that it is done, and, to that end, may employ assistants, and bind the district for their pay. "Care and keeping," when used in connection with a trust like this, imply the right to preserve the building in the condition in which it is placed in their custody, and make good the waste and injury to which all buildings, and especially public buildings like a schoolhouse, are subject—in other words, to repair. It may not imply the right to remodel and improve, but it implies the right to do all that may come fairly and strictly within the term "repair." Conklin v. School Dist. No. 37, 22 Kan. 521, 525.

As maintenance.

"Care," as used in a bequest of a legacy for the care of a person, is substantially the same as the maintenance of such person. Kelly v. Jefferis (Del.) 50 Atl. 215, 216. 3 Pennewill, 286.

Within the meaning of a will providing for a gift of property to a person who may take care of testator's wife the word "care" means attention, as well as moneys, maintenance, and necessities of life. Christy v. Pulliam, 17 Ill. (7 Peck) 59, 61.

A divorce in which the "care and custody" of a child were decreed to the wife, without charging its maintenance to either spouse, does not change the duty of support from the husband to the wife. Keller v. City of St. Louis, 54 S. W. 438, 152 Mo. 596, 47 L. R. A. 391.

As protection.

"Care," as used in the title of an act to provide for the branding, herding, and care of stock, is synonymous with the word "protection," and therefore sufficiently expressed an object. In re Pratt, 34 Pac. 680, 681, 19 Colo. 138.

CARE TAKER.

"A care taker is defined as one employed in a building or on an estate during the absence of the owner, to look after goods or property of any kind (Cent. Dict. 823), or as one employed to watch over or keep in order property, as a house, in the absence of the family" (Stand. Dict.). Hill v. Coates, 69 N. Y. Supp. 964, 965, 34 Misc. Rep. 535.

CAREFUL.

The word "careful," within the meaning of a statement that an obvious danger arising from defective appliances may be avoided by the operator being careful, means additional or more than ordinary care. Lasch v. Stratton, 42 S. W. 756, 763, 101 Ky. 672.

CARELESS.

"Careless" means without exercising that degree of care which a person of ordinary common sense and prudence, under like circumstances and in the performance of a like act, would have exercised. Flesh v. Lind- say, 21 S. W. 907, 909, 115 Mo. 1, 37 Am. St. Rep. 374.

"Careless," as used in a finding stating that plaintiff was careless in working near the shaft without removing his coat or protecting his garments, is equivalent to "negligent," since negligence is the failure to exercise such care as the circumstances require. Norfolk Beet Sugar Co. v. Preuner, 75 N. W. 1097, 1098, 55 Neb. 656.

The use of the words "careless manner" in a publication by a newspaper that plaintiff had been discharged for his general careless manner in attending to business, does not necessarily imply unskilled and incompetent, and therefore the publication is not libelous, and cannot be made so by innuendo. On the contrary, such words are entirely consistent with the fact that the plaintiff is fitted, skilled, and competent. Ratzel v. New York News Pub. Co., 73 N. Y. Supp. 849, 851, 67 App. Div. 598.

An allegation and proof that persons are "negligent and careless" is not allegation or proof that they were incompetent. A competent person may be careless, and an incompetent person may, as far as his knowledge or skill goes, be careful. Kelly v. Cable Co., 34 Pac. 611, 613, 13 Mont. 411.

In an action against a railroad company for wrongful ejection from its train, an instruction that whenever an element of malice or oppression, or a reckless disregard of the rights of others, enters into a transaction, and when the act is done on the strict line of duty of the conductor, but done under a state of facts not justifying the act done, and in a wrongful or perhaps careless manner, the law authorizes exemplary damages, was not erroneous because of the use of the expression "careless manner"; the word "careless" being used in the sense of "reckless." Choctaw, O. & G. R. Co. v. Hill, 75 S. W. 963, 965, 110 Tenn. 396.

The words "reckless" and "careless" do not impute willfulness or intention. They mean nothing more than simple negligence. Hence it is held that where a complaint in an action for injuries averred that the injuries occurred through the reckless, careless, and negligent acts of defendant in striking plaintiff with a pistol, which was discharged, and there was no allegation that the shooting was intentional, instructions authorizing a recovery on proof showing a willful and intentional shooting were erroneous. Greathouse v. Croan (Ind. T.) 76 S. W. 273, 275.

CARELESSNESS.

"Carelessness" means lack of ordinary care; that is, lack of such care as a man of ordinary care would exercise under the particular circumstances of the case. Lago v. Walsh, 74 N. W. 212, 214, 98 Wis. 348.

In usual parlance, "misconduct" means a transgression of some established and definite rule of action, where no discretion is left, except what necessity may demand; and carelessness, negligence, and unskillfulness are transgressions of some established but indefinite rule of action, where some discretion is necessarily left to the actor. Misconduct is a violation of definite law; carelessness, an abuse of discretion under an indefinite law. Misconduct is a forbidden act; carelessness, a forbidden quality of an act, and is necessarily indefinite. Citizens' Ins. Co. v. Marsh, 41 Pa. 386, 394.

The terms "carelessness" and "negligence," in law, are synonyms. Bindbeutel v. Street Ry. Co., 43 Mo. App. 463, 470.

The words "carelessness or negligence," which are used in the statute rendering counties liable for injuries to private property in consequence of a riot, when such injuries are not occasioned by the carelessness or negligence of the owner, mean, according to their normal usage, heedlessness or inattention, and apply to an omission to do something which operates approximately to bring about a result which will not occur if such carelessness or negligence does not exist. In respect to property which has been injured or destroyed by a mob, the idea of the Legislature was that the party should not recover if he omitted some obvious precaution, or failed to exercise some care, which, if it had been timely bestowed, in view of the threatened or apprehended danger, would have averted the calamity. Blodgett v. City of Syracuse, 36 Barb. 526, 531.

"Carelessness" and "negligence," as used in Rev. St. art. 2899, making the proprietor or owner of a railroad liable for injuries arising from the "carelessness or negligence" of his servants, are synonymous, since negligence is but the omission of care, and carelessness is etymologically the same thing. Turner v. Cross, 18 S. W. 578, 579, 83 Tex. 218, 15 L. R. A. 262.

CARET.

See "Signs."

CARGO.

See "Full and Complete Cargo"; "With Cargo."

The word "cargo," ex vi termini, means the goods on board of the vessel. Seamans v. Loring (U. S.) 21 Fed. Cas. 920, 924.

A charter party requiring a ship of 261 tons to load a "full and complete cargo" requires the ship to put on board as much goods as she is capable of carrying with safety—not necessarily 261 tons. Hunter v. Fry, 2 Barn. & Ald. 421, 426.

"A cargo is the lading of a ship or other vessel, the bulk or dimension of which is to be ascertained from the capacity of the ship or vessel; and, where the name of the ship or vessel is in the contract, her capacity for carrying or the bulk of her cargo need not be stated, for the word 'cargo' embraces all that the vessel is capable of carrying." Flanagan v. Demarest, 26 N. Y. Super. Ct. (3 Rob.) 173, 181.

Cargo is a lading of a vessel, and means everything that is put aboard the vessel for carriage. Phile v. The Anna (Pa.) 1 Dall. 197, 206, 1 L. Ed. 98; Sargent v. Reed, 2 Strange, 1223.

Generally speaking, a cargo means the entire load of the ship which carries it, and it may be assumed that, when one man undertakes to sell and another to buy a cargo, the subject-matter of the contract is to be the entire load of the vessel. Pinckney v. Dambmann, 19 Atl. 450, 452, 72 Md. 173.

As used in a policy of insurance: "$10,000, namely: $2,326 on the cargo, $1,860 on the freight, $5,814 on the profits on board of the brig Dick, freight valued at $30,000 and profits at $25,000"—the word "cargo" means, not the property on board exclusively belonging to the shipowner, but all the property constituting the ship's lading—all the property on which freight and profits were to accrue. Bayard v. Massachusetts Fire & Marine Ins. Co. (U. S.) 2 Fed. Cas. 1065, 1068.

A charter party providing that "the owner shall have an absolute lien upon the cargo for the recovery of all freight, dead freight, demurrage," etc., means the cargo from time to time put on board the vessel. Gilkison v. Middleton, 2 C. B. (N. S.) 134, 154.

Animals on deck.

The word "cargo" does not apply exclusively to goods, but may be applied to steerage passengers, but by American writers the term has been construed as applying to goods only. 1 Phil. Ins. 185. According to Postlethwaite, "cargo" signifies all the merchandise and effects which are laden and brought on ship, exclusive of the soldiers, crew, rigging, ammunition, provisions, etc., but mules on deck cannot be protected as cargo, because they are exposed to a greater risk. Wolcott v. Eagle Ins. Co., 21 Mass. (4 Pick.) 429, 435.

"Cargo," as used in a marine policy, refers only to the goods below hatches, and not to those stored on deck. "The word 'cargo,' in an order for insurance, does not ordinarily cover live stock; but, if live stock constitutes the only article of exportation from the port from which the vessel carrying the insured property is to sail to the port to which she is destined, or if, according to the mercantile usage of the place, the word

'cargo' is understood to cover live stock, then the insurance under that general denomination will cover live stock." Allegre's Adm'r's v. Maryland Ins. Co. (Md.) 2 Gill & J. 136, 162, 20 Am. Dec. 424.

Ballast.

While canal boats are employed in carrying ballast to or from a vessel, that ballast is to be construed as their cargo. Endner v. Greco (U. S.) 3 Fed. 411, 413.

Blubber, oil, and casks.

"Cargo" is a word of large import, and means the lading of a ship, of whatever it consists, and covers the outfit as well as the "catchings," which is a technical word denoting the blubber taken on board, the oil, and the casks. Macy v. Whaling Ins. Co., 50 Mass. (9 Metc.) 354, 368.

Oil and other articles which are the ordinary products of a whaling voyage, and the procuring of which constitutes its direct object, are a part of the cargo. Paddock v. Franklin Ins. Co., 28 Mass. (11 Pick.) 227, 230.

Coin.

The terms "cargo" and "freight" include coin, and the freight of it, put on board by the owner of the ship to be invested by the master in merchandise. Wolcott v. Eagle Ins. Co., 21 Mass. (4 Pick.) 429, 432.

Household furniture.

The term "cargo" has been held not to include household furniture. Vasse v. Ball (Pa.) 2 Dall. 270, 276, 1 L. Ed. 377.

Passengers.

The words "cargo" and "freight," prima facie and in their ordinary and natural meaning, refer to goods only; and, where the words "cabin passengers" and "passage money" appear in the same charter party with the words "cargo" and "freight," the latter do not include passengers and passage money of any description. Lewis v. Marshall, 7 Man. & G. 729, 745.

Raft in tow.

The word "cargo" may be used in speaking of the cargo of a tugboat, to designate a raft of logs which the tug is towing to the sawmill. Moore v. Louisville Underwriters (U. S.) 14 Fed. 226, 236.

Rigging, provisions, etc.

"Cargo" signifies all the merchandise and effects which are laden on board a ship, exclusive of the rigging, provisions, etc. Thwing v. Great Western Ins. Co., 103 Mass. 401, 406, 4 Am. Rep. 567.

The term "cargo" applies to the provisions, clothing, stores, casks, and whaling gear which an outward bound whaling vessel on a long voyage must of necessity carry. Paddock v. Franklin Ins. Co., 28 Mass. (11 Pick.) 227, 230.

CARGO SALE OR TRANSACTION.

The essential features of a cargo transaction, as relating to sales of grain, is that the whole purchase must go in one vessel, which carries no other freight, in order that the whole purchase may be handled without any complications by the purchaser. The vessel is consigned to some convenient port, which need not be a grain market—as, for instance, Cork "for orders." On arrival at this port the vessel finds orders from the purchaser to proceed to some defined port and unload. Heyworth v. Miller Grain & Elevator Co., 73 S. W. 498, 499, 174 Mo. 171.

CARNAL ABUSE.

See "Abuse of Female Child."

CARNAL KNOWLEDGE.

See, also, "Sexual Intercourse."

"From very early times in the law, as in common speech, the meaning of the words, 'carnal knowledge of a woman by a man' has been sexual bodily connection." Commonwealth v. Squires, 97 Mass. 59, 61.

The term "carnal knowledge" is synonymous with "sexual intercourse." Noble v. State, 22 Ohio St. 541, 545.

The words "carnal knowledge," as used in Pen. Code, art. 523, defining rape as the carnal knowledge of a woman, etc., means sexual intercourse. Burk v. State, 8 Tex. App. 336, 342.

The term "carnal knowledge" implies sexual intercourse, and is included in the term "seduce and debauch," as used in an indictment for seduction. State v. Whalen, 63 N. W. 554, 555, 98 Iowa, 662 (citing State v. Curran, 51 Iowa, 112, 49 N. W. 1006).

Penetration.

Carnal knowledge carries with it the idea of sexual intercourse, and this, as understood in common parlance, means a completed act of coition. Lujano v. State, 24 S. W. 97, 32 Tex. Cr. R. 414 (citing Burk v. State, 8 Tex. App. 336, and McMath v. State, 55 Ga. 303).

In a prosecution for rape, an instruction that, to amount to a sufficient carnal knowledge of the female to render the crime complete, there must be a penetration of the female organ by the whole organ of the male, was held to correctly give the law. Osgood v. State, 25 N. W. 529, 530, 64 Wis. 472.

Carnal knowledge is the insertion of the male organ of a male to some extent—however slightly—into the female organ of a female. Maxey v. State, 52 S. W. 2, 3, 66 Ark. 523.

CARNALLY KNOW.

The word "ravish," as used in indictments for rape, presupposes force in carnal knowledge, but the term "carnally know" does not charge force; and, where an indictment alleges that the accused did "ravish and carnally know" a party under 15 years of age, the prosecution can be successfully maintained by proving force, or not, according to the proof of the case. McAvoy v. State, 51 S. W. 928, 929, 41 Tex. Cr. R. 56.

An indictment for rape is not duplicitous in using the words "ravish" and "carnally know" in connection with the allegation of the age of the female as being under 15 years, as they charge two separate and distinct kinds of rape—that with force and that without force. Buchanan v. State, 52 S. W. 769, 41 Tex. Cr. R. 127.

The words "carnally knowing" and "abusing unlawfully," do not contemplate actual force or the absence of the will, but that, although no force be used, and the female yield her consent, yet, being under the age of puberty, she is incapable of consenting. Charles v. State, 11 Ark. 389, 406.

CARPENTER.

See "Ship's Carpenter or Builder."

What is prohibited by the term "carpenters," within a provision in an insurance policy against using the premises insured for hazardous purposes, including in such term breweries, barns, stables, and carpenters, is the use of insured premises for the purpose of carrying on the work or business of a carpenter, or converting the premises into a carpenter shop; and that, at the time of the fire, carpenters were at work on the roof of one of the buildings, was insufficient to show any violation of the policy. Washington Fire Ins. Co. v. Davidson, 30 Md. 91, 103.

A carpenter is one who works in timber—a framer or builder of houses—and the term does not include a plasterer, who overlays work with plaster. Fox v. Rucker, 30 Ga. 525, 527.

A statute giving masons and carpenters a mechanic's lien for work and materials furnished by them in building and repairing houses cannot be construed as including the owners of mills who furnished lumber, but is confined to actual masons or carpenters. Pitts v. Bomar, 33 Ga. 96, 97.

CARPENTER'S RISK.

The term "carpenter's risk," as used in an insurance policy, providing that "a carpenter's risk" was granted during the term of the policy, means the extraordinary risk consequent on making repairs in the insured building. Alkan v. New Hampshire Ins. Co., 10 N. W. 91, 94, 53 Wis. 138.

CARRIAGE.

See "Pleasure Carriage."

"Carriages," as used in an ordinance providing that no one shall keep or hire out any carriages without a license, refers only to vehicles used for the conveyance of persons, and not those used in the transportation of property. Snyder v. City of North Lawrence, 8 Kan. 82, 84.

"Carriage," as used in the statute providing for the recovery of damages against a town for injuries done to the plaintiff's carriage by the insufficiency of a highway, means whatever carries the load, whether on wheels or runners, and also that which is carried, whether on wheels or runners or on horseback. Conway v. Town of Jefferson, 46 N. H. 521, 526.

Rev. St. c. 30, § 3, prohibiting a person from recovering damages for injuries sustained because of the breaking down of a tollbridge, if the weight of the load which he was transporting exceeded a certain amount, exclusive of the "team and carriage," should be construed as not including the weight of the driver seated upon the load. Dexter v. Canton Tollbridge Co., 12 Atl. 547, 548, 79 Me. 563.

The term "carriage," as used in the road act, shall be construed to include stage-coaches, wagons, carts, sleighs, sleds, and every other carriage or vehicle used for the transportation of passengers and goods, or either of them. Cobbey's Ann. St. Neb. 1903, § 6064.

Bicycle.

A carriage is a contrivance which is used for carrying or transporting, especially along or over a solid surface; a wheeled vehicle for the conveyance of persons. The term is sufficiently extensive to include a bicycle. Davis v. Petrinovich, 21 South. 344, 112 Ala. 654, 36 L. R. A. 615; Jones v. City of Williamsburg, 34 S. E. 883, 97 Va. 722, 47 L. R. A. 294; Swift v. City of Topeka, 23 Pac. 1075, 43 Kan. 671, 8 L. R. A. 772; Shade-wald v. Phillips, 75 N. W. 717, 718, 72 Minn. 520.

In cases involving the use of streets, or sidewalks, the payment of tolls, and liability for negligence, bicycles are uniformly held to be vehicles or carriages. State ex rel. Bettis v. Missouri Pac. Ry. Co., 71 Mo. App. 385, 390 (citing Mercer v. Corbin, 117 Ind. 450, 20 N. E. 132, 3 L. R. A. 221, 10 Am. St. Rep. 76; Thompson v. Dodge, 58 Minn. 555, 60 N. W. 545, 28 L. R. A. 608, 49 Am. St. Rep. 533; Geiger v. Perkiomen & R. Turnpike Road, 167 Pa. 582, 31 Atl. 918, 28 L. R. A. 458; Commonwealth v. Forrest, 170 Pa. 40, 32 Atl. 652, 29 L. R. A. 365; Twilley v. Perkins, 77 Md. 252, 26 Atl. 286, 19 L. R. A. 632, 39 Am. St. Rep. 408, and notes). This consensus of authority establishes that the locomotive machine known as a "bicycle" belongs to the genus vehicle or carriage. See, also, Swift v. City of Topeka, 23 Pac. 1075, 43 Kan. 671, 8 L. R. A. 772; Gagnier v. City of Fargo, 88 N. W. 1030, 1031, 11 N. D. 73, 95 Am. St. Rep. 705; Jones v. City of Williamsburg, 34 S. E. 883, 97 Va. 722, 47 L. R. A. 294; Davis v. Petrinovich, 21 South. 344, 112 Ala. 654, 36 L. R. A. 615; Lacy v. Winn, 4 Pa. Dist. R. 409, 412; Laredo Electric & Ry. Co. v. Hamilton, 56 S. W. 998, 1000, 23 Tex. Civ. App. 480; Mercer v. Corbin, 20 N. E. 132, 134, 117 Ind. 450, 3 L. R. A. 221, 10 Am. St. Rep. 76; State v. Collins, 17 Atl. 131, 16 R. I. 371, 3 L. R. A. 394; Taylor v. Goodwin, 27 Wkly. Rep. 489, 490; Id., 4 Q. B. Div. 228, 229; Holland v. Barch, 22 N. E. 83, 85, 120 Ind. 46, 16 Am. St. Rep. 307; Geiger v. Perkiomen & R. Turnpike Road, 31 Atl. 918, 920, 167 Pa. 582, 28 L. R. A. 458.

A bicycle comes within the term "other vehicle," as used in Code 1897, § 4008, exempting a team or wagon or other vehicle to the head of a family, from execution, where such bicycle is used daily by the laborer in connection with his work. Roberts v. Parker, 90 N. W. 744, 117 Iowa, 389, 57 L. R. A. 764, 94 Am. St. Rep. 316.

A bicycle is not a wagon or carriage, within the meaning of the statute exempting from debt a wagon and carriage used by the defendant. Shadewald v. Phillips, 75 N. W. 717, 718, 72 Minn. 520.

A bicycle is a vehicle, and governed by the same rules as that governing the use of vehicles. Myers v. Hinds, 68 N. W. 156, 157, 110 Mich. 300, 33 L. R. A. 356, 64 Am. St. Rep. 345.

"Carriage," as used in Pub. St. c. 52, § 1, enacting that highways shall be kept in repair, so that the same may be reasonably safe and convenient for travelers, with their horses, teams, and carriages, at all seasons of the year, does not include a bicycle, so as to entitle one injured by being thrown from his bicycle because of a depression in the highway to recover for the injury. Richardson v. Inhabitants of Town of Danvers, 57 N. E. 688, 176 Mass. 413, 50 L. R. A. 127, 79 Am. St. Rep. 320.

1 Wds. & P.—62

Coach.

"Carriage," as used in the charter of a tollroad, fixing a certain toll rate for every coach, chariot, "or other four-wheeled carriage," does not include coaches. Cincinnati, L. & S. Turnpike Co. v. Neil, 9 Ohio, 11, 13.

A vehicle on four wheels, drawn by four horses, constructed and used like an ordinary stagecoach, is a four-wheeled pleasure carriage, within the charter of a turnpike company regulating the tolls. Talcott Mountain Turnpike Co. v. Marshall, 11 Conn. 185, 190.

Railroad or street car.

In the charter of a city, authorizing it to adopt ordinances to prevent the incumbering of streets with carriages, etc., "carriage" is to be construed as including railroad cars. City of Duluth v. Mallett, 45 N. W. 154, 43 Minn. 204.

"Carriage" does not convey the idea of a railroad car or of a street railroad car, nor does it even convey the idea of a wheeled vehicle used for the transportation of merchandise or products used in ordinary business. The idea conveyed is a vehicle used for the transportation of persons either for pleasure or business, and drawn by horses or other draught animals over the ordinary streets and highways of the country, and not cars used exclusively upon railroads or street railroads expressly constructed for the use of such cars. Cream City R. Co. v. Chicago, M. & St. P. Ry. Co., 23 N. W. 425, 427, 63 Wis. 93, 53 Am. Rep. 267.

1 Rev. St. p. 696, § 6, providing that the owners of carriages running on the highway for the conveyance of passengers shall be liable for all injuries done by the driver while driving such carriage, does not include street railroad cars; and the conductor of a street railway car is not the driver of a carriage, within the meaning of the act. Isaacs v. Third Ave. R. Co., 47 N. Y. 122, 124, 7 Am. Rep. 418.

Under an act authorizing the taking of tolls for every carriage or other wheeled vehicle of whatever description, street cars are not included. A street car certainly is a wheeled vehicle, in the general sense of the term. It is a vehicle in the same sense as an ordinary railroad car is a vehicle, but both are vehicles of some extraordinary character in this sense: that they can only be used as a means of conveyance on a permanent, continuous, and connected track. The vehicles specified in the act are of that class which require no such special appliances to permit their passage; and it is reasonable to suppose that the general phrase "other wheeled vehicles of whatever description," used in immediate connection therewith, referred to vehicles of the same general class or kind as those particularly specified. Monongahela Bridge Co. v. Pittsburgh & B. Ry. Co., 8 Atl. 233, 236, 114 Pa. 478.

Single-horse buggy.

"Carriage," as used in a city ordinance providing for a license for each hack, carriage, coach, or omnibus, the word "carriage" is sufficiently comprehensive to include single-horse buggies. City of Burlington v. Unterkircher, 68 N. W. 795, 797, 99 Iowa, 401.

Wagon.

As wagon, see "Wagon."

"Carriage" is a general term, and will include a wagon. It is so used in a statute relating to persons using wagons or other carriage on a turnpike. Pardee v. Blanchard, 19 Johns. 442, 444.

CARRIAGE HIRE.

Code 1873, § 3820, declares that every person who shall arrest any person, and be required to convey him from a distant place to the county jail, shall be entitled to receive, beside the fees allowed by law, whatever sums such person shall actually and necessarily pay for carriage hire in so conveying such person to jail. Held, that the words "carriage hire," as there used, did not include railroad fare, so as to authorize a constable to recover the amount paid for the railroad fare of himself and prisoner in conveying the prisoner from the place where he was arrested to the county jail. Wheeler v. Clinton County, 60 N. W. 207, 208, 92 Iowa, 44.

CARRIAGE OF GOODS.

See "Bailment"; "Contract of Carriage."

CARRIER.

See "Initial Carrier"; "Marine Carrier"; "Private Carrier."

Any person undertaking to transport goods to another place for compensation is a carrier. Civ. Code Ga. 1895, § 2263.

A carrier embraces one who receives goods under an agreement to forward them to the place of destination, the charge for freight for the whole distance being stipulated for in the agreement. It does not include one who simply engages to forward goods marked for a particular destination, as the latter is merely a forwarder. Krender v. Wolcott, 1 Hilt. 223-227.

CARRIER OF THE MAIL.

As laborer, see "Laborer."

In Rev. St. U. S. § 3980 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 2690], directing any carrier of the mail to receive any mail matter presented to him, etc., the words "carrier of the mail" include a city letter carrier employed under section 3865. Wynen v. Schappert (N. Y.) 6 Daly, 558, 560.

CARRIER OF PASSENGERS.

See "Common Carrier of Passenger."

A "carrier of passengers" is one who undertakes to carry persons from place to place gratuitously or for hire. Simmons v. Oregon R. Co., 69 Pac. 1022, 1023, 41 Or. 151.

CARRY.

As on board.

In a policy of insurance for a certain amount on prepaid freight on board a certain boat, the freight valued at a certain sum "carried or not carried," such words apply only to the valuation of the freight, and may well signify that the insured would be entitled to recover the whole sum insured, though he might not take on board all the goods which entitled him to the entire amount which had been advanced to him. The words are equivalent to "on board or not on board," and do not import that the subject of insurance relates to goods or cargo, and not to freight, in the ordinary meaning of that word. Minturn v. Warren Ins. Co., 84 Mass. (2 Allen) 86, 91.

As carry away.

See, also, "Carry Away."

The word "carry," as used in an indictment for larceny, has not the same meaning as the words "carry away." No single word in our language expresses the meaning of "exportavit"; hence the word "away" must be subjoined to the word "carry" to modify its general signification and give it a special and distinctive meaning. Commonwealth v. Adams, 73 Mass. (7 Gray) 43, 45.

"Carry," in an indictment for larceny, is insufficient to charge the crime, where the word "away" is either accidentally or by design omitted, so that the charge against the defendant was that he did feloniously steal, take, and carry certain property. Commonwealth v. Pratt, 132 Mass. 246, 247.

As transport.

"Carried," as applied to the carriage of goods by a carrier, is equivalent to "transported." Dunbar v. Port Royal & A. Ry. Co., 15 S. E. 357, 358, 36 S. C. 110, 31 Am. St. Rep. 860.

Carry bill.

An indorsement on a bill of exchange to "carry this bill to the credit of A." has been held to be a restrictive indorsement, which operates to put an end to the negotiability of the paper. Lee v. Chillicothe Branch State Bank (U. S.) 15 Fed. Cas. 151, 153.

Carry insurance.

The word "carry," as applied to insurance, means possess or hold, and hence it is held that a question in an application for life insurance as to what amount of insurance the insured now carries on his life does not refer to a paid-up policy which has ceased to be a burden to the insured. Dimick v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., 55 Atl. 291, 293, 69 N. J. Law, 384, 62 L. R. A. 774.

Carry stock.

To carry stock means to provide funds or credit for its payment for the period agreed upon from the date of purchase. Saltus v. Genin, 16 N. Y. Super. Ct. (3 Bosw.) 250, 260.

CARRY AWAY.

Carry as, see "Carry."

A grant to carry away the spent bark of a tannery does not involve the right to lodge it on the land of the grantor and obstruct the natural flow of a stream of water. Winchester v. Osborne, 61 N. Y. 555, 563.

"Take and carry away," in an indictment under a statute making it a felony to take and carry away a negro by force and violence, was insufficient, as such words do not of themselves imply force and violence. Hamilton v. Commonwealth (Pa.) 3 Pen. & W. 142, 146.

In larceny.

See "Larceny."

See, also, "Away."

A "carrying away," as the term is understood in the law of larceny, is sufficiently shown by taking wheat from its place in the granary, filling it into sacks, and tying the sacks. State v. Hecox, 83 Mo. 531, 536.

A carrying away, within the meaning of the rule that there must be a carrying away of the stolen property, to constitute larceny, is shown by the fact of shooting a cow in the woods, and in taking possession and handling the carcass so as to progress halfway in skinning it, and leaving the carcass only when frightened by the bark of a dog and the approach of men. Lundy v. State, 60 Ga. 143.

The least removal of property from a place where it is found by the proof is a "carrying away" of it, within the criminal law. Gettinger v. State, 14 N. W. 403, 404, 13 Neb. 308.

An instruction that defendant is guilty of grand larceny if she stole, took, and carried away the property is bad, in failing to state the nature of the taking, as the words

"stole, took, and carried away" are not as particular as the words used in a statute which requires that a taking must be wrongful and with a felonious intent in order to constitute a sufficient indictment. State v. Campbell, 18 S. W. 1109, 108 Mo. 611.

A charge that another has carried away a book is not per se actionable, as meaning stealing, but can be made to appear actionable in a pleading by a colloquium showing that by carrying away was clearly meant stealing. Nye v. Otis, 8 Mass. 122, 125, 5 Am. Dec. 79.

The words "carry away or unlawfully appropriate with intent to steal," as used in Crimes Act, § 162, providing for the punishment of any persons who shall carry away or unlawfully appropriate with intent to steal any domestic fowl, are not equivalent to the word "steal," as used in section 158 of the act, providing for the punishment of any person who shall steal the money or personal goods of another. State v. Shutta, 54 Atl. 235, 237, 69 N. J. Law, 206.

CARRY ON BUSINESS.

See "Doing Business"; "Transacting Business."

Engaged in business, see "Engage."

The meaning of the phrase "to carry on," when applied to business, is well settled. In Worcester's Dictionary the definition is "to prosecute; to help forward; to continue; as, to carry on business, etc." Florsheim Bros. Dry Goods Co. v. Lester, 29 S. W. 34, 35, 60 Ark. 120, 27 L. R. A. 505, 46 Am. St. Rep. 162 (citing Cooper Mfg. Co. v. Ferguson, 113 U. S. 727, 5 Sup. Ct. 739, 28 L. Ed. 1137).

The constant daily repetition by a person of the same act, each act bringing with it a money return, is the "carrying on" by the person of a business in that particular line. A person who opens an office, advertises that he has money to lend on application, and makes daily and hourly loans at interest, particularly for short periods, on so extensive a scale as to necessitate the employment of clerks, carries on the business of money lending, and is subject to a license, though the money loaned be his own. State v. Tolman, 31 South. 320, 322, 106 La. 662.

The phrase "power to carry on the business," in a will giving the executrix full power to conduct the business in which testator was engaged, was construed to imply, in the absence of anything in the will to the contrary, the right in the executrix to appropriate sufficient assets of the estate to accomplish the object, and therefore that she was authorized to carry on all business interests, and in so doing was not limited to capital invested in the business. Furst v. Armstrong, 51 Atl. 996, 997, 202 Pa. 348, 90 Am. St. Rep. 653.

By or through agents.

One who resides in Scotland and carries on business in London by means of an agent does not "dwell or carry on his business" within the city of London, within the meaning of 10 & 11 Vict. c. 71, requiring such dweller to sue in the city small-debt court for a debt not exceeding £20. Sheils v. Rait, 7 C. B. 116.

One who systematically has agents in a prohibited district, soliciting and executing orders for wine, is "carrying on the business of a wine merchant," within the meaning of a contract of sale by which he had agreed to abstain from such business, and it was not material how he brought the wine to his customers—whether from stores within or without the district. Turner v. Evans, 2 El. & Bl. 512, 519.

Where a foreign corporation appoints agents in Tennessee for the purpose of working up a loan business and inducing people to effect loans with the corporation, who do effect loans, it carries on business in Tennessee, in the sense of the foreign corporation laws. United States Savings & Loan Co. v. Miller (Tenn.) 47 S. W. 17.

Continuous operation.

"Carry on business," as used in Act 1869, providing that whenever any married woman shall carry on business, and shall incur any debt on account of the same, she shall be liable therefor, means that the business must be pursued as a continuous and substantial employment; and the mere renting of a few rooms by a married woman in the house in which she lived with her husband was not carrying on a business, within the meaning of the statute. Holmes v. Holmes, 40 Conn. 117, 120.

"Carry on," as used in a city ordinance providing that any person who shall carry on a business for which a license is required, without first taking out such license, shall, on conviction, be fined, etc., implies a continuous operation, so that a person alleged to have carried on a business without a license for some length of time was only guilty of a single offense, and not a separate offense for each day during which the business was carried on. Nashville, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. City of Attalla, 24 South. 450, 451, 118 Ala. 362.

In Comp. St. §§ 1356, 1366, requiring every person who shall carry on any lottery business to pay a license, and providing that any persons who shall transact any business requiring a license, without first obtaining the same, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, the words "carry on business" and "transact business" mean the same thing. They are convertible terms, and are so used in the statute, and the distinction cannot be made that the first may refer to a single act, while the latter means a pursuit or occupation in which a person engages for the purpose of a livelihood or as a source of profit. Territory v. Harris, 19 Pac. 286, 288, 8 Mont. 140.

Employment.

9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, § 60, enacts that summons may issue in any district in which the defendant or one of the defendants shall dwell or carry on his business at the time of the action brought. Held, that the term "carry on business" implies some continuous and permanent occupation of a person, and hence does not mean a mere service from which one may be discharged. Sangster v. Kay, 5 Exch. 386, 387.

A clerk in the admiralty, who attends daily at an office in the city of London, is not a person who carries on his business there, within Act 10 & 11 Vict. c. 71, § 40, providing that a debtor who shall dwell or "carry on his business" within the city of London may be sued therein. Buckley v. Hann, 5 Exch. 43, 45.

A person rendering services to others employed in the ice business is not "carrying on" the business, within a covenant binding him not so to do. Grimm v. Warner, 45 Iowa, 106.

Fixed place.

"Carries on his business," as used in 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, § 128, providing that process must be served where the defendant dwells or carries on his business, contemplates some fixed place at which the party's business is carried on, at least for a certain time. Rolfe v. Learmonth, 14 Adol. & El. (N. S.) 196, 199.

Issuance of policies in another state.

See "Doing Business"; "Insurance Business"; "Transacting Business."

"Carrying on business," as used in a statute providing that, when a foreign corporation carries on its corporate business in this state by means of an agent, it impliedly assents to be sued here in the person of such agent, does not include writing insurance by correspondence in a state where a foreign corporation had no office or agent. The courts of England, in endeavoring to determine the meaning of the term "carrying on business," have stated that it depends largely on the nature of the home and foreign business, and that there must be a managing control or governmental business done by the corporation in England; that is, a sort of a branch of the foreign company. Hazeltine v. Mississippi Valley Fire Ins. Co. (U. S.) 55 Fed. 743, 749.

Where a statute (Acts Ark. 1887, p. 234) provided that, before any foreign corporation shall carry on any business within the state, it shall file a certificate in the office of the Secretary of State, etc., and that in default thereof the contracts of such foreign corporations with citizens of the state should be void, the term "carry on business" related only to the making of contracts within the state, and did not include the issuance of policies of insurance by a foreign insurance corporation to citizens of the state, where the contracts were made in the state of the corporation's residence. Marine Ins. Co. v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. (U. S.) 41 Fed. 643, 653.

"Carrying on business," within the meaning of the statute in reference to licensing insurance agents to carry on business in the state, etc., does not apply to the issuing of policies in another state, or the act of an agent in examining a single house in the state. Jackson v. State, 50 Ala. 141.

A Pennsylvania insurance company wrote four accident policies on risks in Wisconsin, all of which were negotiated by correspondence with the company, and not through the medium of any agent located in the state, or going into it for the purpose, and were issued and the premiums thereon paid at the office in Pennsylvania. Held that, even if such transactions could be considered a doing of business within the state at the time by the company, such business did not continue after the policies had been issued, merely by reason of the fact that they were held by persons in the state; nor did the collection of a renewal premium on one of such policies through the cashier of a local bank, at the suggestion and for the supposed accommodation of the policy holder, constitute the doing of business within the state, so as to render the company subject to the jurisdiction of its courts. Frawley, Bundy & Wilcox v. Pennsylvania Casualty Co. (U. S.) 124 Fed. 259, 264.

For profit or livelihood.

"Carry on any business," as used in Revenue Law 1868, declaring it unlawful for any person to engage in or "carry on any business" thereafter mentioned, without first having obtained a license therefor, means to carry on a business for profit or as a means of livelihood, and it is not necessary that it should be the sole or exclusive business. Harris v. State, 50 Ala. 127, 130. It may be pursued while engaged in another business, or in connection with another, and the true inquiry is, what was the intent of the party? If it was the intention of the party to derive a profit or a means of livelihood from engaging in the business, he was guilty of violating the statute, whether he derived any profit from it or not. Weil v. State, 52 Ala. 19, 21.

Single transaction.

The sending of a note by a resident of Alabama to Tennessee for discount in that state by a Memphis company is not a carrying on of business in Alabama by such company, within Const. Ala. art. 14, and Acts 1886-87, pp. 102-104, imposing certain prerequisites upon the carrying on of business in that state by a foreign corporation. Bamberger v. Schoolfield, 16 Sup. Ct. 223, 230, 160 U. S. 149, 40 L. Ed. 374.

The phrase "carry on business," as used in the statute requiring a foreign corporation to file its charter or take out a license or pay a franchise tax before it can carry on business, is construed so that a solitary act of business, not indicating a purpose to carry on business, is not within the statute. Oakland Sugarmill Co. v. Wolf Co. (U. S.) 118 Fed. 239, 245.

The making in one state by a foreign corporation of one contract by which it agreed to build and deliver in another state certain machinery, and the other party to pay for it, does not constitute a carrying on of business in the first state. "The meaning of the phrase 'to carry on,' when applied to business, is well settled. In Worcester's Dictionary the definition is: 'To prosecute; to help forward or continue, as carry on business.' The definition given to the same phrase in Webster's Dictionary is 'to continue, as to carry on a design; to manage or prosecute, as to carry on husbandry or trade.'" Cooper Mfg. Co. v. Ferguson, 5 Sup. Ct. 739, 742, 113 U. S. 727, 28 L. Ed. 1137.

Rev. St. tit. 12, c. 7, which requires foreign corporations carrying on business within the territory to file articles with the Secretary of State and county recorder, does not include a single business transaction within the territory by a foreign company. Babbitt v. Field (Ariz.) 52 Pac. 775, 776.

Selling an occasional drink out of a bottle is not carrying on the business of a retail liquor dealer. United States v. Jackson (U. S.) 26 Fed. Cas. 556.

To sell whisky on a few separate occasions within 12 months is not carrying on the business of a liquor dealer in the business of selling whisky. Espy v. State, 47 Ala. 533, 538.

Carrying on business, within the meaning of the statute making it criminal to carry on the business of retail liquor dealer without a license, is not shown by proof of a single sale of liquor. Lawson v. State, 55 Ala. 118, 119.

To "carry on business" has been uniformly construed as signifying that which occupies the time, attention, and labor of men for the purpose of livelihood or profit. It has been held that the doing of a single act pertaining to a particular business will not be considered engaging in or carrying on the business, though a series of such acts would be so considered. One act may be sufficient to constitute a carrying on of business, according to the intent with which the act is done. Abel v. State, 90 Ala. 631, 633, 8 South. 760.

The words "carrying on business" or the "plying of a vocation" necessarily involve the idea of successive acts—continuity of habit—and proof of a single act of hiring or soliciting a laborer to be employed beyond the state limit could not constitute the offense of carrying on the business of an emigrant agent. State v. Napier, 41 S. E. 13, 15, 63 S. C. 60.

Of brewer or distiller.

A person who distills spirits or brews beer, though not for sale, carries on the business of a brewer or distiller, though, in ordinary speech, one who distills for his own use, merely, would not be said to carry on the business. United States v. Wittig (U. S.) 28 Fed. Cas. 744.

Carrying on a brewery is a manufacture of beer. State v. Weckerling, 38 La. Ann. 36, 38.

Of manufacturing.

Tax Law 1884, exempting manufacturing companies carrying on business in this state from taxation, means the establishment of a factory, the bringing of raw material thereto, and converting it into wares. State v. American Glucose Co., 5 Atl. 803, 43 N. J. Eq. (16 Stew.) 280.

"Manufacturing corporations carrying on manufacture within this state," in a statute providing that all foreign corporations doing business in New York shall be taxed, except manufacturing corporations carrying on manufacture within this state, include a foreign corporation which does some of its manufacturing in New York, although the greater portion is done in another state. People v. Wemple, 31 N. E. 238, 133 N. Y. 323.

"Carrying on manufacturing," as used in Laws 1880, c. 542, § 3, exempting "corporations carrying on manufacturing" within the state from taxation, does not include a foreign manufacturing corporation bringing wire from its factory into New York, and there fitting it with hooks and loops to adapt it for sale. People v. Wemple, 34 N. E. 386, 387, 138 N. Y. 582.

The phrase "carrying on business in this state," in the statute exempting from taxation manufacturing companies carrying on business in this state, imports that such companies must actually locate and begin work under their charter, in order to be entitled to such exemption. Norton Naval Construction & Shipbuilding Co. v. State Board of Assessors, 22 Atl. 352, 53 N. J. Law (24 Vroom) 564.

Of railroad company.

A railroad company does not carry on business, within the meaning of 9 & 10 Vict.

§ 128, providing that the service of summons shall be made where the defendant shall carry on business, etc., at a receiving house or booking office kept by an agent for the receipt and the booking of parcels and packages for all the railways generally. Minor v. London & N. W. Ry. Co., 1 C. B. 325, 331.

A railroad can only carry on business, within the meaning of the eleventh section of the bankruptcy act of 1867, providing that corporations may take the benefit of the bankruptcy law by petition addressed to the judge of the judicial district in which such debtor has resided or carried on business for six months, etc., at the place where the railroad is or is to be constructed, maintained, and operated, and hence a district court in the Southern District of New York has no jurisdiction to adjudge an Alabama railroad corporation a bankrupt. In re Alabama & C. R. Co. (U. S.) 1 Fed. Cas. 271, 272.

"Carrying on business," within the meaning of the bankrupt act, looks to the scheme and purpose to which the transactions tend, and not to the incidental transactions themselves. Thus the business of a railroad corporation is, by its charter, the construction, maintenance, and operation of a railroad. In aid thereof, it may be necessary or expedient to employ agents and agencies in other places than those in which its business of constructing, maintaining, and operating the road can be done, but the transactions of such agents are only incidental. They do not in a just sense constitute the business of the railroad company. That business cannot be removed. The company itself cannot do it, and the fact that a railroad corporation created in Alabama for the purpose of maintaining a railroad there has its principal office and domicile in the city of New York, at which place it has transacted the ordinary commercial and financial business of a railroad corporation, is not a carrying on of business in such place. In re Alabama & C. R. Co. (U. S.) 1 Fed. Cas. 271, 272.

Of surgeon.

A statute giving jurisdiction where the cause of action did not arise within the jurisdiction of the court within which the defendant dwells or "carries on his business" at the time the action was brought would include the case of a surgeon having a fixed residence, but attending on his patients at their houses in several parishes within the jurisdiction of the court. Mitchell v. Hender, 26 Eng. Law & Eq. 194, 196.

Of theater.

A statute imposing a license tax on any person "engaging in or carrying on the business of keeping a theater" meant an actual use or management of a theater, and hence one who had a hall, which he intended to use as a theater, but in which no performance had ever been given, was not within the statute. Gillman v. State, 55 Ala. 248, 250.

CARRY ON MILL.

Hauling quartz through a quartzmill is performing labor for carrying on a mill, within the meaning of a statute giving a laborer's lien for performing labor for carrying on any mill. In re Hope Min. Co. (U. S.) 12 Fed. Cas. 487; Gould v. Wise, 3 Pac. 30, 34, 18 Nev. 253.

CARRY OVER.

A provision in a contract between a lessor and a retailer of machinery requiring the lessor to "carry over all machinery left unsold at the end of the season" is somewhat equivocal and obscure, and resort may be had to the well-defined and known usage of trade as an aid in reaching a true interpretation of the words. South Bend Ironworks v. Cottrell (U. S.) 31 Fed. 254, 255.

CARRY OUT.

"Carried out," as used in a proposition submitted by creditors to their debtor, by which, in consideration of the execution of a mortgage, they agreed to accept a certain percentage in full of their claims, which was to be "carried out" within a certain time, means the performance of the contract within the time limited, by executing the notes and mortgage for which provision was made, and not assent. "To assent is one thing; to perform is another. Assent to a proposition creates, but does not carry out, a contract. Without assent there is no contract, but assent is not performance. Until assent, there is no contract to be performed. To carry out a contract is more than the signing and delivery. Carrying out comes after the execution of the contract. It is performance." Cartmel v. Newton, 79 Ind. 1, 2.

CARRY TO SELL.

Where a servant of a licensed tea dealer was sent through the neighborhood to solicit orders for tea, and was subsequently sent to deliver small parcels in pursuance of such orders, this was not a "carrying to sell," within the meaning of 50 Geo. III, c. 51, relating to hawkers and peddlers, and requiring a license. King v. McKnight, 10 Barn. & C. 734.

CARRY WITH IT.

Act Cong. June 3, 1864, § 30, providing that national banks receiving a greater rate of interest than allowed by the state where the bank is located shall forfeit the entire interest which the note "carries with it," means any interest that the note may carry by operation of law, without reference to any agreement. Cassell v. Lexington, H. & P. Turnpike Road Co. (Ky.) 9 S. W. 502, 506.

CARRYING ARMS OR WEAPONS.

To constitute the offense of carrying arms, within the meaning of Act 1870, c. 13, prohibiting the carrying of arms, the weapons must be carried as arms. The intent with which the weapon is carried must be that of going armed or being armed. Page v. State, 50 Tenn. (3 Heisk.) 198, 200, note.

CARRYING CONCEALED WEAPONS.

See "Carrying Arms or Weapons"; "Habitually Carrying Concealed Weapons."

Carrying weapons about the person, see "About the Person."

A carrying of concealed weapons, within the meaning of the statute prohibiting such an act, is shown by the mere fact of having a weapon upon the person. State v. Carter, 36 Tex. 89, 90.

The term "carrying concealed weapons," in the meaning of a statute prohibiting the carrying of such weapons, is to be construed as meaning carrying concealed weapons for the purpose of use, and therefore the carrying of a pistol, not for use as a weapon, but only for the purpose of delivering it to the owner, is not criminal. State v. Roberts, 39 Mo. App. 47, 48.

Carrying concealed weapons, within the meaning of the statute making such act criminal, means a carrying for use, and does not embrace a mere carrying for the purpose of sport. State v. Murray, 39 Mo. App. 127, 128.

A person who purchased two pistols in a town, and, for the purpose of obtaining balls for the pistols, was carrying them from the store where he purchased them to one or more places where ammunition was sold, and from thence to his home, some miles distant, was not "carrying a pistol," within the meaning of Act April 12, 1871, prohibiting the carrying of pistols on the person. Waddell v. State, 37 Tex. 354, 355.

A statute prohibiting the carrying of arms means carrying arms with a view of being armed and ready for offense or defense in case of a conflict with another, and hence, where one borrowed a pistol for the purpose of joining in a chase after a bear, and returned the pistol soon after the return from the chase, he was not going armed, in the sense of the statute. Moorefield v. State, 73 Tenn. (5 Lea) 348.

Carrying a pistol is not within the statute, where a person buys it on one side of a public street, and carries it to his residence, on the other. Christian v. State, 37 Tex. 475, 476.

A carrying of concealed weapons, within the meaning of the statute prohibiting such an act, is not shown by evidence that defendant found a pistol, and carried it to his home concealed in his pocket. Mangun v. State, 15 Tex. App. 362, 363.

Where a merchant purchases a pistol with a view to trade, and carries it from one store in a town to another for the purpose of having it packed with other goods, he is not guilty of carrying concealed weapons, though he thoughtlessly puts it in his pocket. State v. Gilbert, 87 N. C. 527, 529, 42 Am. Rep. 518.

There is a carrying of concealed weapons, within the meaning of the statute prohibiting such a carrying, in carrying a broken and inefficient pistol for the purpose of having it repaired; and certainly this is so if, on his way to or from the shop, the individual superadds to his original purpose and intention a resolution to produce the pistol suddenly and use it in making a hostile demonstration against one whom he happens to encounter while he has his pistol concealed. Crawford v. State, 21 S. E. 992, 94 Ga. 772.

Act April 12, 1871, prohibiting the carrying of a pistol, refers to all cases where a pistol is carried under circumstances not expressly excepted by the language of the act, and the fact that the accused considered it necessary to carry a pistol for his convenience or protection is no defense. Reynolds v. State, 1 Tex. App. 616, 618.

One who, after arriving at a public gathering, comes into the possession of a pistol, does not render himself liable to prosecution under Pen. Code, § 342, prohibiting any one, except certain designated officers of the law, from carrying a pistol about his person to any public gathering in this state. Modesette v. State, 115 Ga. 582, 584, 41 S. E. 992.

The word "carries," as used in Code, § 3274, providing that any one who carries concealed about his person a pistol or firearm shall be fined, etc., is synonymous with "bears," and hence one who has in a vest pocket a pistol is carrying the arm, within the sense of the statute. Owen v. State, 31 Ala. 387, 389.

CART.

"Cart," as used in a statute exempting from execution one horse, one ox, and cart, means a carriage in general, though in its primary and ordinary acceptation it signifies a carriage with two wheels. Favers v. Glass, 22 Ala. 621, 624, 58 Am. Dec. 272.

Within the statute exempting a cart or truck wagon, a cart does not include a peddler's wagon, to be used in trade from place to place, with a body hung on springs, with a drawer behind and doors at the sides, and a railing around the top, and a dasher in front. Smith v. Chase, 71 Me. 164, 165.

CARTAGE.

Cartage is a charge made for the expense of delivering goods from a car when the purchaser did not take them on the track. Everingham v. Halsey, 78 N. W. 220, 221, 108 Iowa, 709.

CARTEL VESSEL.

A cartel vessel is a vessel commissioned in time of war to exchange the prisoners of two hostile powers, or to carry any particular proposal from one to carry. She is a neutral licensed vessel, and all persons concerned in her navigation, on the particular service in which both belligerents have employed her, are neutral in respect to both, and under the protection of both. She cannot carry on commerce under the protection of her flag, because this was not the business for which she was employed, and for which the immunities of that flag of truce were granted to her. All contracts made for the equipping and fitting out of a cartel vessel are to be considered as contracts made between friends, and hence enforceable in the tribunals of either belligerent having jurisdiction of the subject. Crawford v. The William Penn (U. S.) 6 Fed. Cas. 778, 780.

CARTON.

The carton in which gloves and hosiery are placed is a box or cover in which the goods are contained, within the meaning of Act March 3, 1883, § 7, repealing the law imposing a duty on the usual box or covering of imported goods. Oberteuffer v. Robertson, 6 Sup. Ct. 462, 470, 116 U. S. 499, 29 L. Ed. 706.

CARTWAY.

A "cartway" is as distinct as possible from a public highway. Indeed, it is a way established by law for a person who has not the benefit of a public highway, and for that reason alone; and where an indictment charges the obstruction of a common and public highway, and the proof is that the way obstructed was a private cartway, there was a fatal variance. State v. Purify, 86 N. C. 681, 682.

In a new country the highways alone were of much importance. These were laid off and established by order of court, and kept up at the public charge. To the highways were added cartways for persons who occupied land to which there was no public highway. These were also laid out and established by order of the court, and when established were for public use, as well as for the use of the individuals at whose instance they were ordered. Boyden v. Achenback, 79 N. C. 539, 541.

CASE.

As contents of case or package.

Defendant was convicted under an indictment charging him with receiving stolen property, and described the property as two cases of cigars; but the evidence showed that he received loose cigars after the cases of cigars had been stolen and those he received taken out of the cases by other parties. It was held that the word "case," as used here, was not shown to have a recognized meaning, as denoting packages containing a certain number or quantity of cigars, and, even if it had such meaning, it should still be construed as descriptive of a case containing cigars, and not of a certain number of cigars, without reference to their packing, and hence the charge in the indictment was not sustained by the proof. Gabriel v. State (Fla.) 32 South. 779, 780.

As covering, box, or sheath.

The word "case," as used in a claim for a patent, reciting that it was for the apparatus therein described, for drying gravel and sand, consisting of the fire chamber, flues, heating pipes, and case, all constructed and arranged substantially as set forth, means, as defined by Webster, "a covering, box, or sheath." A screen in the bottom of the box or frame in which the wet sand or gravel was placed to be dried, which was not a covering or sheath for the apparatus, was not a part of the case, so as to be included within the claim. Bradley v. Dull (U. S.) 19 Fed. 913, 914.

CASE (In Practice).

See "Agreed Case"; "Cause (In Practice)"; "Civil Action — Case — Suit — etc."; "Claim Cases"; "Criminal Case or Cause"; "Divorce Case"; "Equity Cases"; "Extraordinary Case"; "In Case"; "In Case of Death"; "Moot Case"; "Remedial Cases"; "Special Case."

All cases, see "All."

Any case, see "Any."

A case is a contested question before a court of justice; a suit or action; a cause. It is defined by Webster to be a state of facts involving a question for discussion or decision—especially a cause or a suit in court. Smith v. City of Waterbury, 7 Atl. 17, 19, 54 Conn. 174; Southwick v. Southwick, 49 N. Y. 510, 517; Ex parte Towles, 48 Tex. 413, 433; Slaven v. Wheeler, 58 Tex. 23, 25; Home Ins. Co. v. Northwestern Packet Co., 32 Iowa, 223, 236, 7 Am. Rep. 183.

A case "is a question contested before a court of justice in an action or suit at law or in equity. The primary meaning of the word, according to the lexicographers, is cause. When applied to legal proceedings, it imports a state of facts which furnish occasion for the exercise of the jurisdiction of a court of justice. In this, its generic sense, the word includes all cases, special or otherwise." Buell v. Dodge, 63 Cal. 553, 554; Kundolf v. Thalheimer, 12 N. Y. (2 Kern.) 593, 596.

The word "case," as used in Code 1873, § 2529, providing a time in which to bring actions for relief on grounds of fraud in cases heretofore solely cognizable in a court of chancery, means a contested question in a court of justice, and does not refer to the action, or to the form thereof, but to the questions and rights involved. Gebhard v. Sattler, 40 Iowa, 152, 156.

The term "cases," as used in Const. art. 3, § 2, providing that federal courts shall have jurisdiction of cases arising under the Constitution or laws of the United States, "is not limited in its meaning to a case in which a party comes into court to demand something conferred on him by the Constitution or law, but is used in its more extended sense, as meaning a right of one party as well as of the other, and may be said to arise under the Constitution or a law of the United States, whenever its correct decision depends on the construction of either." Cohens v. Virginia, 19 U. S. (6 Wheat.) 264, 378, 5 L. Ed. 257.

Under the Constitution of the United States, declaring that the judicial power of the federal courts shall extend to all "cases in law and equity" arising under this Constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made or which shall be made under their authority, this clause enables the judicial department to receive jurisdiction to the full extent of the Constitution, laws, and treaties of the United States, when any question respecting them shall assume such a form that the judicial power is capable of acting on it. That power is capable of acting only when the subject is submitted to it by a party who asserts his rights in the form prescribed by law. It is then a case. Osborn v. United States Bank, 22 U. S. (9 Wheat.) 738, 822, 6 L. Ed. 204.

Under Const. U. S. art. 3, § 2, providing that the judicial power shall extend to all "cases in law and equity" arising under the Constitution or laws of the United States, and treaties made or which shall be made under their authority, etc., the words mean all cases in law and equity in any court within the United States, whether state or federal, in which a right of action or a defense arises or is claimed under the Constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States. A case in law or equity consists of the right of one party as well as of the other, and may be truly said to arise under the Constitution or a law of the United States whenever its correct decision depends on the construction of either. Ableman v. Booth, 11 Wis. 498, 508.

A case is a suit in law or equity instituted according to the regular course of judicial proceedings; and when it involves any question arising under the Constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States, it is within the judicial power confided to the Union under Const. U. S. art. 3, § 2. Pacific Steam Whaling Co. v. United States, 23 Sup. Ct. 154, 155, 187 U. S. 447, 47 L. Ed. 253 (citing Osborn v. Bank of United States, 22 U. S. [9 Wheat.] 738, 6 L. Ed. 204).

A "case," in ordinary parlance, is that which falls, comes, or happens; an event; also a state of things involving a question for discussion; and an offense committed by a party while in the naval service is a case arising in the naval forces, within the meaning of those terms as used in the fifth amendment to the Constitution, and Congress has power to authorize the trial of such an offense by a court-martial under such amendment. In re Bogart (U. S.) 3 Fed. Cas. 796, 799.

The term "cases and controversies," as used in the Constitution of the United States, embraces claims or contentions of litigants brought before the court for adjudication by regular proceedings established for the protection or enforcement of rights, or the prevention, redress, or punishment of wrongs. Interstate Commerce Commission v. Brimson, 154 U. S. 447, 475, 14 Sup. Ct. 1125, 38 L. Ed. 1047; Smith v. Adams, 9 Sup. Ct. 566, 568, 130 U. S. 167, 32 L. Ed. 895. Whenever the claim or contention of a party takes such a form that the judicial power is capable of acting upon it, then it has become a case or controversy. Smith v. Adams, 9 Sup. Ct. 566, 568, 130 U. S. 167, 32 L. Ed. 895.

A "case" arises, within the meaning of the Constitution giving the federal courts jurisdiction, as well when defendant seeks protection under a law of Congress as when a plaintiff goes into court to demand some right conferred by law. Jones v. Seward (N. Y.) 26 How. Prac. 433, 435.

Where there is a plaintiff capable of suing, a defendant who has no personal exemption from suit, and a cause of action cognizable in the court, there is a "case," within the meaning of that term as defined by judicial decisions. United States v. Lee, 1 Sup. Ct. 240, 260, 106 U. S. 196, 27 L. Ed. 171.

Where a sale of land was absolutely void for fraud, so that those claiming under it could not maintain an action to recover the property, the sale and deed executed thereon would amount to no sufficient defense to the recovery of the property in an action at law by plaintiffs; hence their rights and the questions involved therein are not solely cognizable in a court of chancery, within Code 1873, § 2529, subd. 4, providing that actions for relief on the ground of fraud in cases heretofore solely cognizable in a court of equity are barred in five years, and section 2530, providing that in actions for relief on the ground of fraud the cause of action shall not be deemed to have accrued until the fraud complained of shall have been discovered by the party aggrieved. The word "case" here means a contested question in a court of justice. Bouv. Law Dict. It does not refer to the action, or the form thereof, or the character it may assume on account of the forum in which it is prosecuted, but to the questions and rights involved. Gebhard v. Sattler, 40 Iowa, 152, 155.

As action, cause, or suit.

"Case" and "cause" are used as synonyms in statutes and judicial decisions, each meaning a proceeding in court; a suit; an action. Blyew v. United States, 80 U. S. (13 Wall.) 581, 595, 20 L. Ed. 638; Theisen v. Johns, 72 Mich. 285, 293, 40 N. W. 727, 730; Erwin v. United States (U. S.) 37 Fed. 470, 479, 2 L. R. A. 229.

"Cases" primarily means or includes "causes." Cases arising in justice court are causes—mostly common-law causes. Benson v. Cromwell (N. Y.) 26 Barb. 218, 221.

The word "cases," as used in Const. art. 6, § 14, giving the county court jurisdiction in cases arising in justices' courts and in special cases, but no original civil jurisdiction, except in such special cases, "was a more appropriate word than 'causes,' for it includes not only causes, but special proceedings, and is more commonly used as including equity as well as common-law actions than the word 'causes' is. 'Cases in equity' is a more familiar phrase than 'causes in equity.'" Benson v. Cromwell (N. Y.) 26 Barb. 218, 222.

There is no distinction between the term "action," as usually employed by the members of the profession and writers on law, and the word "case," in Rev. Code, c. 106, § 12, providing that it shall not be necessary to set forth in any manner the place in which an act is done, unless from the nature of the case the place may be material. A "case," as here referred to, and the word employed imports, means a civil action of some form and nature between two or more parties in a court of law, either decided or still pending, which may be of different kinds, but the first and most prominent distinction between them, when they differ from each other, is the form and legal nature of the action in which the case is instituted, and the best general indication of this distinction in the nature of these different cases in courts of law is the different forms of action in which they are commenced. The pleadings also vary very considerably in these various actions and cases at common law, with the several forms of action appropriately adapted to them, and with the issues of fact as well as law joined and presented in the pleadings; but, whatever may be the form of the action, or the difference of the pleadings in it from those in any other action, each is alike usually termed a "case" or an "action at law," and they usually import one and the same thing. Parvis v. Truax (Del.) 32 Atl. 1050, 1051, 7 Houst. 575.

"Case," in the Revised Statutes, is indisputably used as synonymous with "cause" or "action," and is not to be construed as meaning merely a special proceeding, and not as embracing actions. Beecher v. Allen (N. Y.) 5 Barb. 169, 173.

Though in its more ordinary signification meaning a state of facts involving a question for discussion and decision, when used in an order of court transferring a case to another tribunal, the word "case" means an action or cause in court. Wingate v. Haywood, 40 N. H. 437, 445.

A case is a suit or action—a cause—but though a proceeding to set aside the probate of a will is called, in Civ. Code Proc. § 1314, a "case," yet such proceeding is not an action, as defined in the Code. In re Joseph's Estate, 50 Pac. 768, 118 Cal. 660.

The Constitution, requiring the Court of Appeals to file an opinion in writing in every case, contemplated some action by the tribunal which should be effective and binding on the parties on both sides of a cause brought there by appeal or writ of error. State v. Shields, 49 Md. 301, 304.

"Case" and "suit" mean the same thing, and an affidavit that a party has a just defense on the merits of the case means a just defense on the merits of the suit. New Brunswick Steamboat & Canal Transp. Co. v. Baldwin, 14 N. J. Law (2 J. S. Green) 440, 443.

In court a "case" is philologically a suit in court. Suits are remedies by which wrongs are redressed or rights recovered. City of Baltimore v. Ritchie, 51 Md. 233, 245.

The word "case" is more comprehensive in meaning in common parlance than either "suit" or "action," and includes applications for divorce, and for establishment of highways, applications for support of relatives, and other special proceedings unknown to the common law. Gold v. Vermont Cent. R. Co., 19 Vt. 478, 484.

The word "cases" in the proviso in the act of Congress creating judicial districts in Indian Territory, and providing that, in all criminal cases where courts outside of the territory shall have acquired jurisdiction, they shall retain jurisdiction, means actions. This appears not only from its immediate context, but from a comparison of the proviso wherein the word occurs with the preceding clause, wherein occurs the word "offenses." United States v. Lee (U. S.) 84 Fed. 626, 630.

The word "case," in Code Civ. Proc. § 14, providing that an action on a bond given in an attachment case, injunction case, or any case whatever, required by statute, etc., is used, not in a technical sense of "cause," but, rather, in the sense of "instance." The words "attachment" and "injunction," as used here, are not adjectives. They are used in the same way that we speak of replevin or mandamus, and it is not necessary to employ the phrase "a replevin case" or "a mandamus case." Crum v. Johnson (Neb.) 92 N. W. 1054, 1055.

The words "in any case," in Code, c. 50, § 91, providing that " * * * no more than one new trial shall be granted by a justice in any case, mean that no more than one new trial shall be granted either party in any suit. By giving to the words "in any case," its phraseological, combined with its technical, meaning, rather than its technical legal meaning, results in the double purpose of allowing one new trial, and only one, to either party in any suit, whether tried by the justice or a jury. On the other hand, by restricting it to its technical legal meaning, it is rendered possible in the trial of every case before a justice, for the existence of two opposite verdicts. Dickey v. Smith, 42 W. Va. 805, 809, 26 S. E. 373, 375.

The word "case," as used in How. Ann. St. § 2268, providing that any person selling liquor to a minor under the age of 18 years shall be liable for actual and exemplary damages to the parent in such sum, not less than $50 in each case, as the court or jury shall determine, is synonymous with "cause," and it cannot be said that the Legislature, in fixing the minimum of the recovery, intended to make the penalty for each sale the sum of $50. Theisen v. Johns, 72 Mich. 285, 293, 40 N. W. 727.

As allegations and facts.

Code Cr. Proc. art. 677, requiring that the charge of the court shall distinctly set forth the law applicable to the case, means the case as made by the evidence. Chamberlain v. State, 8 S. W. 474, 475, 25 Tex. App. 398; Cooper v. State, 3 S. W. 334, 335, 22 Tex. App. 419.

Within a statute requiring the court to give to the jury, by proper instructions, the law applicable to the case, the case is that which is charged in the indictment and supported by the evidence. Serio v. State, 3 S. W. 784, 785, 22 Tex. App. 633.

An affidavit that defendant has fully stated the facts of the case to his counsel means that he has fully and fairly stated the case to his counsel. Jordan v. Garrison (N. Y.) 6 How. Prac. 6, 8.

Where a rule provides that the affidavit of merits must state that the party deposing "has fully and fairly stated the case to his counsel," it is not complied with by an affidavit that he has made a full and fair statement of all the facts of the case to his counsel. Brown v. St. John (N. Y.) 19 Wend. 617, 619.

All proceedings in action included.

A case "is a state of facts which furnishes occasion for the exercise of the jurisdiction of a court of justice. To the existence of such a case parties are necessary; also pleadings and proceedings, trials, orders, judgments," etc. Calderwood v. Peyser, 42 Cal. 110, 115; Comstock Mill & Min. Co. v. Allen, 31 Pac. 434, 435, 21 Nev. 325. The term "case" embraces everything from the filing of the complaint to the entry of satisfaction of the judgment. They are all steps in, or parts of, the same case. Comstock Mill & Min. Co. v. Allen, 31 Pac. 434, 21 Nev. 325.

The word "cases," as used in Const. art. 5, § 3, declaring that each circuit court shall consist of a president and two associate judges, and providing that in the absence of certain judges the others shall be competent to hold a court, except in capital cases, should be construed to embrace all the stages of criminal proceedings from the impaneling of the grand jury to the execution of the final sentence, and is not synonymous with prosecution, so as to exclude the proceedings prior to the indictment. Cook v. State (Ind.) 7 Blackf. 165.

Judiciary Act 1789, c. 20, § 34, providing that the laws of the several states, except where the Constitution, treaties, or statutes shall otherwise require or provide, shall be regarded as rules of decision in trials at common law in the courts of the United States in cases where they apply, will not be construed to apply to judgments. The statute is to be construed "as furnishing a rule to guide in the formation of its judgment, and not one for carrying that judgment into execution. It is a rule of decision, and the proceedings after judgment are merely ministerial." Wayman v. Southard, 23 U. S. (10 Wheat.) 1, 22, 6 L. Ed. 253.

The term "case," as used in Rev. St. § 838 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 644], providing that for the expenses incurred and services rendered in all cases, where it was decided not to bring suit, the district attorney shall receive and be paid from the treasury such sum as the Secretary shall deem just and reasonable, upon a certificate of the judge before whom such cases are tried or disposed of, should be construed to include all complaints reported by revenue officers to the district attorney which might be the subject of the final determination of the court by trial or another action therein. In re Account of District Attorney (U. S.) 23 Fed. 26, 27.

Application to judge at chambers.

An application addressed to the judge at chambers was not a case, within the constitutional provision that equity cases shall be tried in the county where the defendant resides against whom substantial relief is prayed. Heath v. Miller, 44 S. E. 13, 16, 117 Ga. 854.

As case on appeal.

The "case," as used in a statute mentioning the papers which may constitute a part of the judgment roll, refers to the case to be prepared on an application for a new trial addressed to the court below, and not to the case prepared for appeal. If the word was considered to mean the case prepared for argument on appeal, it would be impossible for the clerk to comply with the requirement, in view of the time given the appellant to prepare and serve the case for appeal; but if the word "case" was considered to mean, as we think it is clear it should be, the case prepared for motion for a new trial addressed to the trial court, there will be nothing to prevent the clerk from complying with the requirement. Tribble v. Poore, 6 S. E. 577, 579, 28 S. C. 565.

The word "case," as used in Rev. St. 1887, § 3130, providing that when in any such case the judgment of the district court is affirmed there shall be taxed as part of the costs in the case, a reasonable attorney's fee, the word refers to a proceeding in error from the district court to the Supreme Court. Syndicate Imp. Co. v. Bradley, 44 Pac. 60, 61, 6 Wyo. 171.

As cause of action.

Under the provision of the Code permitting the plaintiff to set up in his supplemental bill facts material to the "case" it is said that the case is the cause of action set up in his complaint. Another and entirely distinct cause of action does not constitute a case. Swedish American Nat. Bank v. Dickinson Co., 69 N. W. 455, 459, 6 N. D. 222, 49 L. R. A. 285.

The word "case," as used in the Code, allowing an amendment by inserting "other allegations material to the case," means the facts stated in the pleading, as constituting the cause of action or defense; and the allegations proposed to be inserted by amendment must therefore be material to the case already made, and not merely material to another and wholly different case. Woodruff v. Dickie (N. Y.) 31 How. Prac. 164, 167.

Contempt proceedings.

"Case" is synonymous with "cause," and means any question, civil or criminal, contested before a court of justice. An attachment against a defaulting witness or juror for contempt of court is an independent suit and a cause. In proceedings for contempts or failure to obey orders or writs of a court, the parties have a right to be heard, and to clear themselves of the charge of contempt, if they can. Such a proceeding is commenced by a regular process of the court, and there is a question to be contested and decided." Erwin v. United States (U. S.) 37 Fed. 470, 480, 2 L. R. A. 229

An order of a probate court committing an administrator for contempt of court is a final determination in a criminal proceeding, and such procedure presents a case which may be revived by writ of error both at common law and under the Constitution, in the absence of a statute authorizing an appeal. Haines v. People, 97 Ill. 161, 176.

Controversy or question distinguished.

In construing the provision of the Constitution giving United States courts jurisdiction of cases in law and equity, cases in admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, controversies to which the United States shall be a party, and controversies between two or more states, or between citizens of one state and another state, etc., the Supreme Court, in Cohens v. Virginia, 19 U. S. (6 Wheat.) 264, 5 L. Ed. 257, determined that the word "suit" is not so broad as the word "controversy," because it determined that a writ of error could be maintained, though it was not a suit, and yet it could not be denied that it was a controversy. Mr. Justice Iredell, in Chisholm v. Georgia, 2 U. S. (2 Dall.) 419, 431, 432, 1 L. Ed. 440, distinguished between the word "controversies" and the word "cases" in this connection, by confining the former to such as are of a civil nature; but this change in language from the word "cases" to the word "controversies" will be found to have been a mere matter of style, and to have no relation to any limitation or extension of the class of questions to be adjudicated. So long as this section of the Constitution speaks especially with reference to the nature of the questions involved, it uses the word "cases," but, when it considers more particularly proceedings having relation to the existence of parties, it uses the word "controversies," probably because, when parties are speaking of a raid against each other, the literary style suggested the change. Under such construction, a writ of habeas corpus, being a suit, is a controversy, within the provisions of the Constitution. King v. McLean Asylum of the Massachusetts General Hospital (U. S.) 64 Fed. 331, 336, 12 C. C. A. 145.

The Constitution of the United States gives jurisdiction to the courts of the United States over "cases in law and equity, cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, controversies between two or more states, and controversies between citizens of different states." This language makes a distinction between cases or suits, on the one hand, and controversies, on the other, and the Supreme Court has repeatedly and explicitly recognized the distinction thus made. The doctrine has been settled in various decisions of that court that if a suit embraces but one controversy, and the parties to it on either side are not wholly residents, respectively, of different states, the suit cannot be removed, yet, if in the suit there is a separable controversy, the parties to which, actually interested in the decision of it, are on each side wholly citizens of different states, then the suit may, on the petition of one or more such parties to the separable controversy, be removed into the federal court. Snow v. Smith (U. S.) 88 Fed. 657, 658 (citing Blake v. McKim, 103 U. S. 336, 26 L. Ed. 563; Barney v. Lathan, 103 U. S. 205, 26 L. Ed. 514).

There is a clear distinction between a "case arising under the patent laws" and a "question arising under the patent laws." The former arises when the plaintiff in his opening pleading, be it a bill, complaint, or declaration, sets up a right under the patent laws as ground for a recovery; the latter may appear in the plea or answer, or in the testimony. The determination of such question is not beyond the competency of the state tribunals. Carleton v. Bird, 47 Atl. 154, 156, 94 Me. 182.

Decision of judge as arbitrator.

Civ. Code, § 5527, provides that either party in a civil case, and the defendant in a criminal proceeding, may except to any sentence, judgment, or decision or decree of the court or judge thereof. Held, that the Supreme Court has no power to review a decision by a judge unless the same was rendered in a civil cause or criminal proceeding, and hence cannot review a decision of a judge acting merely as an arbitrator. Banigan v. Nelms, 106 Ga. 441, 32 S. E. 337.

Election contests.

In considering the validity of Rev. St. 1845, § 224, making the decision of a circuit court on an appeal thereto in an election case final, it was held that Const. art. 5, § 5, providing for the original jurisdiction of the Supreme Court in certain cases, and that such court shall have appellate jurisdiction in all other cases, had no application, the court saying: "Whether this clause of the Constitution was designed to give to this court appellate jurisdiction in all cases except those specified in which it is given original jurisdiction, not subject to any legislative restrictions or limitations in that regard, or merely to define the general character of its jurisdiction as being appellate only, except in the cases specified, it is not necessary here to consider, as the proceeding to contest an election under our statute is not a 'case,' within the meaning of that section of the Constitution. This is merely a statutory proceeding for canvassing the votes cast at an election, in which the illegal votes may be registered, and those which are legal may be counted, and the result ascertained; and the finding of that result is not a 'judgment,' in the sense in which that term is used in the law giving the right to prosecute a writ of error, nor is the proceeding by means of which that result is reached a 'case,' within the meaning of the Constitution. That term would refer more properly to an action at law or a suit in chancery, but this proceeding is neither one nor the other." Moore v. Mayfield, 47 Ill. 167, 169.

An election contest is not a "case," within the meaning of Const. art. 6, § 12, providing that the circuit courts shall have original jurisdiction of all cases in law and equity. Douglas v. Hutchison, 55 N. E. 628, 629, 183 Ill. 323.

The word "case," in Rev. St. p. 27, giving an appeal from the circuit court in civil and criminal cases, does not include an election contest. French v. Lighty, 9 Ind. 475, 476.

While each state has the power to prescribe qualifications of its officers and the manner in which they shall be chosen and the title to the offices shall be tried, whether in judicial courts or otherwise, when the trial is in the courts it is a "case," and, if a defense is interposed under the Constitution or laws of the United States, the Supreme Court of the United States has jurisdiction. Boyd v. State, 12 Sup. Ct. 375, 382, 143 U. S. 135, 36 L. Ed. 103.

Mandamus.

The term, "cases cognizable at common law," as used in Act Cong. April 7, 1874, providing for the practice in territorial courts, and declaring that no party shall be provided a right of trial by jury in cases cognizable at common law, does not include proceedings in mandamus. Chumasero v. Potts, 2 Mont. 242, 259.

As each party.

The word "case" has various meanings. In a legal sense it means suit, but in its ordinary usage it means event, result, happening, side, or party. In Code, c. 50, §

91, providing for the granting of a new trial in the case on certain grounds, and providing that in such case he shall appoint a time for a new trial and issue a venire facias, but no more than one trial shall be granted by a justice in any case, it is used in three senses. The first one denotes the suit, the second one denotes the event, and the third one will be held to denote the party. This construction in the last case gives to each of the litigants equal opportunity to be heard once, but after the case has been decided twice one way it becomes a conclusive finality. It is not a case on trial, but a case of a party asking for a new trial, that is indicated. Dickey v. Smith, 26 S. E. 373, 375, 42 W. Va. 805.

Code 1897, § 5314, provides that an attorney appointed to defend a person indicted for a felony other than homicide shall receive from the county the sum of $10 in full for his services, and that only one attorney in any one case shall receive such compensation. It was held that where an attorney was appointed to defend two defendants, jointly indicted and tried, he was entitled to a statutory fee for each, there being in legal effect two appointments; the word "case" meaning an indictment against any one person, for though the indictment may be joint, the pleas may be the same, or they may not. The issues are as to each, and each makes his personal defense. One may be convicted and the other acquitted, the judgment in its co-operation is as to each so far as punishment or penalty is concerned. Separate trials may be awarded and had. If both are convicted, there are two convictions. Clark v. Osceola County, 78 N. W. 198, 199, 107 Iowa, 502.

As pending suit.

Code 1891, c. 127, § 4, provides that at any stage of any case an execution may be issued out for or against the assignee or beneficiary party to show cause why the suit should not proceed in his name. Held, that the word "case," as well as the word "suit," means a pending suit. Wells v. Graham, 39 W. Va. 605, 606, 20 S. E. 576.

Probate proceedings.

A proceeding in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, involving the validity of the probate of a will, and another involving the validity as a will of a paper offered for probate, are each a "case," within Rev. St. D. C. § 772, authorizing the review of the final judgment or decree of that court in any "case" involving a specified amount. On the determination of each depends rights of property, and in each are adversary parties. There can be no reason why Congress should extend the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court to proceedings involving the probate of wills, and not to proceedings involving the validity of an instrument offered for probate as a will. Ormsby v. Webb, 10 Sup. Ct. 478, 482, 134 U. S. 47, 33 L. Ed. 805.

The term "case" is applied by the Code of Civil Procedure to proceedings of distinct inquiry and determination by the court in matters of probate as well as the matters of more formal litigation, and is used in a much broader and less technical sense than the term "action." In re McFarland's Estate, 26 Pac. 185, 189, 10 Mont. 445.

The word "case," as used in the Probate Code, refers to a subject-matter which by the provisions of the Code is cognizable in a county court, and includes every proceeding therein maintained in relation to the same matter or estate. Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 616G.

Special proceedings.

The word "cases," as used in Gen. St. §§ 2425-2428, allowing the prevailing party costs on appeal to the Supreme Court in all classes of cases, legal and equitable, means special proceedings, as contradistinguished from actions. Sease v. Dobson, 15 S. E. 703, 704, 36 S. C. 554.

In common parlance the word "case" has a more extended meaning than the word "suit" or "action," and includes an application for divorce, applications for the establishment of highways, applications for orders of support of relatives, and other special proceedings. Gold v. Vermont Cent. R. Co., 19 Vt. 478, 484.

The word "case," in section 40 of the bankruptcy act (Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, 30 Stat. 556 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3436]) providing that referees shall receive for their services a certain sum for each case, is not used in a technical, restrictive, legal meaning, and it is apparent that the act recognized separate estates, and intended that each petition, set of schedules, and estate should in the bankruptcy court constitute separate cases. Thus where a partnership applies for the benefit of the bankruptcy law, and files a petition for the adjudication of the firm as such, and also separate petitions for the adjudication of the several partners, each petition with the accompanying schedules constitutes a separate and distinct case. In re Barden (U. S.) 101 Fed. 553, 556.

In Code, § 173, designating what issues shall be tried before a jury and what not, the words "in other cases" refer to other civil actions or suits, not to special proceedings created and regulated by statute. Clough v. Clough, 51 Pac. 513, 515, 10 Colo. App. 433.

A proceeding before a United States commissioner is a "case," within a statute providing that a commissioner shall receive a fee for hearing and deciding the case of any person charged with crime. Van Duzee v. United States (U. S.) 41 Fed. 571, 575.

The issue made before the Circuit Court on the application of the Civil Service Commission for an order to compel the giving of testimony or the production of books and papers is a "case," or "controversy," within the meaning of the federal Constitution. People v. Kipley, 49 N. E. 229, 237, 171 Ill. 44, 41 L. R. A. 775 (citing Interstate Commerce Commission v. Brimson, 154 U. S. 447, 14 Sup. Ct. 1125, 38 L. Ed. 1047).

A statute making it perjury to swear to a falsehood in a "case in which the law authorizes an oath to be administered" is not to be confined to suits or proceedings strictly in court, but includes any instance where the law authorizes the making of an oath. United States v. Volz (U. S.) 28 Fed. Cas. 384, 385.

Tax proceedings.

The definition of a "case" is wider than that of a suit or criminal prosecution or a proceeding in rem, although in law it usually applies to one of them. It may embrace, however, any state of facts involving matters for decision, and such has been the common practice. Hence, under the Constitution, providing that the circuit court shall have jurisdiction in all civil and criminal cases, the exclusive jurisdiction of which may not be vested in some other court, the court has jurisdiction to determine the sufficiency of the sureties of the bond of a collector of taxes. Oliver v. Martin, 36 Ark. 134, 139.

A proceeding for the assessment of taxes is not a "case," within a clause giving a writ of error in a civil case where the matter is of greater value than $100. Mackin v. Taylor County Court, 38 W. Va. 338, 343, 18 S. E. 632.

CASE (Action of).

Actions for trespass on the case have been abbreviated so as to be called simply "case"; so that under a statute providing that all actions at law whatsoever, save and except actions on the case for slander or libel, or trespass for injuries done to the person, shall survive, actions for personal injury, which would have been actions of trespass on the case at common law, do not survive. Munal v. Brown (U. S.) 71 Fed. 967, 968.

The action of "case" is the proper remedy for an injury which is a consequence or the collateral effect of an unlawful act, and it is distinguished from trespass vi et armis in that the latter is a remedy for the direct consequence of the wrongful act. Legaux v. Feasor, 1 Yeates (Pa.) 586, 587; Taylor v. Rainbow (Va.) 2 Hen. & M. 423, 438; Harrington v. Heath, 15 Ohio, 483, 485; Leame v. Bray, 3 East, 593, 597; Percival v. Hickey (N. Y.) 18 Johns. 257, 285, 9 Am. Dec. 210.

In Leame v. Bray, 3 East, 593, Le Blanc, J., says that the distinction between trespass and case is that, where the injury is immediate on the act done, trespass lies, but where it is not immediate, but consequential, then the remedy is in case. Percival v. Hickey (N. Y.) 18 Johns. 257, 285, 9 Am. Dec. 210.

Case is the appropriate remedy where the injury proceeds from mere negligence or is not the immediate consequence of the tort, and hence an action against a sheriff for failure to permit plaintiff to obtain bail is in case. Taylor v. Smith, 16 South. 629, 631, 104 Ala. 537.

"Where the term 'case' is adopted in a statute or otherwise, an action for a tort in form ex delicto is generally intended, and not an action in form ex contractu;" and hence an action in assumpsit, though originating under the statute of Westminster, and thus, strictly speaking, an action on the case, is not generally so designated. State v. Harmon, 15 W. Va. 115, 124.

In a statute limiting the time for commencing an action on the case to three years, the term "case" is a generic term embracing many different species of actions. "There are two, however, of more prominent use than any other form whatever." These are "assumpsit" and "trover." Steph. Pl. 18. Such term, as used in such statute, includes an action against the stockholders of an insolvent bank to recover on their statutory liability for the debts of the bank. Carrol v. Green, 92 U. S. 509, 513, 23 L. Ed. 738.

CASE (Action on).

See "Trespass on the Case."

The history of the "action on the case," or "special action on the case," as it was originally called, is well known to the profession. It is not one of the original common-law writs. In the progress of judicial contestation, it was discovered that there was a mass of tortious wrongs, unattended by direct and immediate force, or where the force, though direct, was not expended on an existing right of present enjoyment for which the then known forms of actions furnished no redress. The action on the case was instituted to meet this want. It may then be styled a suppletory, personal action, ex delicto. It was designed to be residuary in its scope, but is always classed among the actions in tort. Mobile Life Ins. Co. v. Randall, 74 Ala. 170, 176.

"Actions on the case" are founded on common law or upon acts of Parliament, and lie generally to recover damages for torts not committed with force, actual or implied. 1 Chit. Pl. 133. Mr. Stevens says that an action on the case lies where a party sues for damages for any wrong to which trespass will not apply. Judge Bliss says that where the injury is not the direct result of force, but grows out of the wrongful act of defendant, the action is trespass on the case, often called "the case." Bliss, Code

Pl. § 9, subd. 2. The right of action against the directors of a national bank for violation of the provisions of the national bank act, given by Rev. St. § 5239 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3515], is for a tort, and comes within the common-law definition of actions on the case. Cockrill v. Butler (U. S.) 78 Fed. 679, 682.

An action on the case is a well-known action in form ex delicto. It is brought for a tort, and is distinguished from a trespass, which is also an action ex delicto and brought for a tort, but which is for those committed by force and immediately, while the action on the case is for those not committed with force and not immediately; and such is its use in a statute providing that damages for infringement of any patent may be recovered by action on the case. Cramer v. Fry (U. S.) 68 Fed. 201, 205.

An action on the case is not founded on any debt, but on the mere justice and conscience of the plaintiff's right to recover. It is in the nature of a bill in equity, and, in general, whatever will in equity and in conscience preclude the plaintiff's right of recovery may be given in evidence into the general issue. Hynson v. Taylor, 3 Ark. (3 Pike) 552, 556.

The term "action on the case" comprehends a great variety of suits. "Such action may be brought upon a statute as well as for fraud or breach of warranty." Sharp v. Curtiss, 15 Conn. 526, 532.

If an injury be forcible and occasioned immediately, but by act of the defendant, trespass vi et armis is the proper remedy, but if the injury be not in legal contemplation forcible, or not direct or immediate, or the act done be of consequence, then the remedy is by action on the case. 1 Chit. Pl. 122. W. had cut wood on land belonging to J. with J.'s approbation, and left the wood lying on J.'s land. J., for the purpose of clearing up another part of this land, and with no intention to burn W.'s wood, set fire to the brush on this other part of his land. The fire escaped from the control of J., and passed onto the land where W.'s wood was, consuming it. Held, that trespass vi et armis would lie for injury. Jordan v. Wyatt (Va.) 4 Grat. 151, 153, 47 Am. Dec. 720.

The action on the case "is an action in which the special circumstances in the case itself are set forth in the complaint or declaration in writing filed in the cause by the complainant or plaintiff, and upon which he claims that he is entitled to recover for such damages as were the natural result of, or were occasioned by, the default of the defendant in the omission or neglect on his part of some duty which the law had cast upon him at the time the circumstances happened. The gist of the complaint, therefore, is defendant's negligence. These actions are based upon the public duty of a defendant—one with which the law charges him." Wallace v. Wilmington & N. R. Co. (Del.) 18 Atl. 818, 819, 8 Houst. 529.

An action on the case is an action on the plaintiff's case, wherein in his declaration he sets out the particular circumstances of the injury he received, and claims damages for that injury. An action for injuries sustained by a person employed to clean street cars, and who was standing near a car for that purpose, by being hit by a wagon driven by an employé of defendant, is an action on the case. Ford v. Charles Warner Co. (Del.) 37 Atl. 39, 40, 1 Marv. 88.

An action on the case lies for a tort not committed with force, actual or implied; for a tort committed forcibly, when the matter affected was not tangible, as for an injury to a right of way or to a franchise; for an injury to a relative right; for an injury resulting from negligence; for a wrongful act done under legal process regularly issued from a court of competent jurisdiction; for a wrongful act committed by defendant's servant without his order and for which he is responsible; for an infringement of a right given by statute; for an injury done to property of which the plaintiff has the reversion only. Emrick v. Little Rock Traction Co., 70 S. W. 1035, 1037, 71 Ark. 71 (citing And. Law Dict.).

CASE (On Appeal).

In Smith v. Grant, 15 N. Y. 590, it is said that a case is in law, in substance, very nearly, if not identically, what a bill of exceptions always was in legal practice, except as to the formal statement of facts which is now required to be inserted. In Bissel v. Hamlin, 20 N. Y. 519, it is said the office of a case is simply to present the questions which are to be examined in the appellate court. It should present those questions with legal and logical precision. Griggs v. Day, 45 N. Y. Supp. 309, 319.

Case on appeal is that which shows in substance the whole evidence, enabling the court to review the finding of the jury as well as the rulings of the judge, together with the bill of exceptions. St. Croix Lumber Co. v. Pennington, 11 N. W. 497, 501, 2 Dak. 467.

The term "case" is used in three distinct senses. It is used in the most general sense as the equivalent merely of "cause" or "suit," as describing the subject-matter of a proceeding in a court of justice. It is used again in a technical sense, as signifying a statement of the proceedings on the trial of an issue of fact. In appellate procedure it is used in still another sense, as meaning the paper book made up for the use of the Supreme Court, containing all the proceedings in the court below necessary to the understanding of a matter to be submitted to the judgment of the Supreme Court, and the proceedings taken by way of appeal to bring the case into the Supreme Court. Sullivan v. Thomas, 3 S. C. (3 Rich.) 531, 546.

"The term 'case' is, according to familiar legal usage, applicable either to a suit or other remedial proceeding in a court of justice, or to matters brought into an appellate court by means of a writ of error and assignments of errors or other similar proceeding. When used to designate a suit or proceeding in a court of original jurisdiction, it embraces the idea of parties and a subject-matter in controversy between them, its character and description for jurisdictional purposes being determined by the nature of demand by the party seeking the court for relief. When applied to a writ of error and assignments of errors, it covers the idea of certain alleged errors in a legal judgment consisting in failure to apply the proper law of the case to its adjudication. Every error assigned is a case in substance and effect, as it would separately and independently support a writ of error as such." State v. Davis, 12 S. C. 528, 540.

Laws 1849, p. 90, providing that on the trial of a question of fact by the court its decision shall be given in writing, and that the facts shall be first stated, and then the conclusions of law on them, and that either party desiring a review of the evidence appearing on the trial, either on a question of law or of fact, may appeal to the court, and "make a case" containing so much of the evidence as may be material to the question to be raised, means the bringing up of so much of the evidence as is material to the question involved; and it is immaterial, for the purposes of review, whether the application, instead of being called a "case-made," is termed "a motion for a new trial and application for review." Smith v. Harris, 43 Mo. 557, 565.

A statement of the case is a statement, in writing, setting forth or showing particularly one or more of the rulings, decisions, or acts excepted to in an action or proceeding, together with the facts and circumstances of the ruling, decision, or act, and the exception thereto, and settled, certified, and filed as provided in this article. The office of a statement of the case is to make such parts of the proceedings or of the evidence in an action appear of record as otherwise would not so appear. Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, §§ 8256, 8257.

A statement of the evidence, or a part thereof, settled by the court for the purpose of reviewing either errors of law or the sufficiency of the evidence or both, is designated in this Code [Code Civ. Proc.] a "statement of the case." Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 5464.

CASE AFFECTING AMBASSADORS, ETC.

See "Affecting."

CASE AT LAW.

Const. art. 6, § 4, providing that the Supreme Court shall have jurisdiction in all cases at law which involve a title or possession of real estate, or the legality of any tax imposed in an assessment, toll, or municipal fine, refers only to civil cases as distinguished from criminal cases. People v. Johnson, 30 Cal. 98, 104.

The expression "case at law" has been invariably construed by the Supreme Court of Minnesota as referring to ordinary common-law actions, as distinguished from suits in equity or admiralty, and special proceedings, and what are called "remedial cases." Hence proceedings upon information in the nature of quo warranto, being of that class designated "remedial cases," are not included in that class denominated "cases at law," within article 1, § 4, of the Constitution, giving a right of trial by jury in such cases. State v. Minnesota Thresher Mfg. Co., 41 N. W. 1020, 1021, 40 Minn. 213, 3 L. R. A. 510.

A proceeding under the insolvent act to determine the insolvency of the debtor, and upon the petition of the creditors for the appointment of a receiver, is not a "case at law," within the provisions of the Constitution authorizing or providing for a trial by jury in such cases. In re Howes, 38 N. W. 104, 106, 38 Minn. 403.

Const. art. 6, § 4, conferring appellate jurisdiction on the Supreme Court in all cases at law which involve the title or possession of real estate, or the legality of any tax imposed, assessments, toll, or municipal fine, does not include proceedings for opening, grading, extending, paving, and altering streets, and the assessment of damages caused by such proceedings have always been considered special proceedings. Appeal of Houghton, 42 Cal. 35, 55.

Const. art. 1, § 5, declaring that the right of trial by jury shall remain inviolate and shall extend to all cases at law, is to be construed as not including proceedings for the appointment of a guardian. "This clause provides, in substance, that the right of trial by jury shall remain inviolate and shall extend to all cases at law. We think that 'cases at law,' as these words are used in the Constitution, are not cases of this description. Cases at law are properly controversies between parties, and not the appointment of guardians for minors or insane persons." Gaston v. Babcock, 6 Wis. 503, 506.

CASE BETWEEN PARTIES IN DIFFERENT STATES.

The phrase "cases between parties in different states," in the judiciary act giving the federal courts concurrent jurisdiction of cases at law or in equity between parties of different states, is held not to include proceedings to probate a will, as in such proceeding there are no parties or all the world are parties, so that it cannot be said to be a controversy between parties of different states. Gaines v. Fuentes, 92 U. S. 10, 21, 23 L. Ed. 524.

CASE OF BOUNDARY.

See "Boundary Case."

CASES OF QUASI CRIMINAL NATURE.

See "Quasi Criminal."

CASE STATED.

A case stated or a special case is an agreed statement of an actual controversy which the parties mutually submit to the court. The parties, where a real contest exists, may enter an action by amicable agreement, and in that action, or in one brought by process issued, may agree to state certain facts for the opinion of the court; and if they desire to have the benefit of a writ of error, may insert in their agreement that it shall be in the nature of a special verdict. Dehl v. Ihrie (Pa.) 3 Whart. 143, 148.

A case stated is a substitute for a special verdict, adopted for convenience to save the labor and expense of finding the same facts by the jury in the form of a special verdict. It is, therefore, but a reasonable construction of the agreement that it shall be attended with the same effects, and liable to the same incidents. Whitesides v. Russell, 8 Watts & S. 44, 47.

A case stated is a substitute for a verdict resorted to for convenience and to save the expense of a trial, its purpose not being to make evidence for a jury, but to supersede the action of the jury altogether by imparting to facts ascertained by consent the judicial certainty necessary to enable the court to pass upon the law and give judgment on the whole. McLughan v. Bovard (Pa.) 4 Watts, 308, 312.

Where parties submit their case to arbitrators, who make a report in writing for the opinion of the court below, the case stands on the same footing as a case stated. Fuller v. Trevoir (Pa.) 8 Serg. & R. 529.

CASH.

The descriptive word "Cash," affixed to the name of the payee of a note, indicates that he was acting in a representative capacity, and that it was in such capacity that the note was made payable to him. Nave v. Hadley, 74 Ind. 155, 157.

CASH.

Cash means money at command, ready money. A sale by a sheriff under an order of court for the highest cash price means a sale for money in hand. Dazet v. Landry, 30 Pac. 1064, 1066, 21 Nev. 291.

The common meaning of the word "cash" is money. Sometimes it means ready money. Hooper v. Flood, 54 Cal. 218, 221.

A voucher in an action on a money claim, stating the amount of the claim as so much "cash," does not inform the defendant as to the real nature and character of the plaintiff's claim. Cash simply means that the defendant owes the plaintiff the sum of money named, but on what account—whether for goods sold or money loaned, or otherwise—the account entirely fails to show. Burk v. Tinsley, 30 Atl. 604, 605, 80 Md. 98.

Cash is money at command, ready money, money on hand which a merchant has to do business with. To receive a check as cash is to receive it as money. Blair v. Wilson (Va.) 28 Grat. 165, 175.

Where a special partner is to contribute an amount of capital agreed upon "in cash," a payment in goods is not a compliance with the agreement. Haviland v. Chace, 39 Barb. 283, 284.

Bank notes and current bills.

Cash includes bank notes. Miller v. Race, 1 Burrow, 452, 459.

Notes of a bank are not "cash," and cannot be tendered as cash, nor can they be brought into court as such. State Bank at Trenton v. Cox, 8 N. J. Law (3 Halst.) 172, 14 Am. Dec. 417.

Bank paper, in conformity with common usage and common understanding, is regarded as cash. Keith v. Jones (N. Y.) 9 Johns. 120.

"Cash" has two meanings; one a payment in current bills, the other in specie. The first is the popular, the latter the legal, meaning. The former has in common parlance entirely supplanted the latter. An advertisement that the sale by a sheriff would be for cash would be understood by every one to be for current bills. A sale for specie under such a notice would not be fair. Farr v. Sims (S. C.) Rich. Eq. Cas. 122, 131, 24 Am. Dec. 396.

Checks and foreign bills.

Cash means specie or its equivalent in current bills of specie-paying banks, and does not include indorsed checks. Crocker v. Crane, 21 Wend. 211, 219, 34 Am. Dec. 228.

A note payable in foreign bills is not a cash note, as cash does not include foreign bills, and therefore is not negotiable. Jones v. Fales, 4 Mass. 245, 253.

Checks are deposited as cash, pass current as cash, the amount thereof is paid out by the bank as cash, and the same check is often used to liquidate several debts. Oftentimes the holder of a check obtains cash for it, instead of depositing it; and under such circumstances a check is valid in the hands of the holder for value, without evidence that he took it under circumstances rendering him guilty of bad faith. It is not enough that the circumstances are suspicious, or sufficient to put a prudent man on inquiry. Glines v. State Sav. Bank (Mich.) 94 N. W. 195, 197.

Confederate currency.

The term "cash" did not embrace Confederate treasury notes, even during the Civil War, and therefore a commissioner appointed to sell land for cash during the war was not authorized to sell for such notes. McNeill v. Shaw, 62 N. C. 91.

"Cash," as used in Rev. Code, § 2228, requiring the sale of the lands of a deceased person to be made for cash, means money; that is, such a currency as was given as a legal tender in payment of debts under the Constitution and laws of the United States, or such a currency as was convertible into such a legal currency without loss to the estate to which it was paid. It does not mean the law currency of the so-called Confederate States. Kitchell v. Jackson, 44 Ala. 302, 304.

Gold dust.

Gold dust is not cash, within the meaning of a contract calling for payment in cash, since the price of gold dust is constantly fluctuating in its market value. It is an article of merchandise. Gunter v. Sanchez, 1 Cal. 45, 49.

Promissory notes.

"Cash means ready money, either in current coin, or in legal tender, or in bank bills or checks payable and received as money, and does not include promises to pay money in the future." Palliser v. United States, 10 Sup. Ct. 1034, 1035, 136 U. S. 257, 34 L. Ed. 514.

A note is an agreement to pay money, and cannot be treated as cash. Pierce v. Bryant, 87 Mass. (5 Allen) 91, 93.

In Sess. Laws 1891, p. 274, c. 83, § 8, providing that members of a mutual insurance company shall at the time of effecting the insurance pay such percentage in cash, the word "cash" means current money, and a note or promise to pay is not cash. State v. Moore, 67 N. W. 876, 878, 48 Neb. 870.

A requirement in a deed of trust that the property should be sold for cash was construed to be satisfied by a part payment of cash and the giving of notes for the balance, which notes were received by lien holders, and the liens discharged, as such notes were equivalent to cash in the hands of the trustees. Mead v. McLaughlin, 42 Mo. 198.

Treasury notes.

"Cash," as used in a request to send cash by mail, should be construed to mean money, and not to include treasury notes. Foquet v. Hoadley, 3 Conn. 534, 536.

In an advertisement for the sale of mortgaged property, the word "cash" imports ready money, in contradiction to credit, and permits payment in United States treasury notes. Meng v. Houser (S. C.) 13 Rich. Eq. 210, 213.

CASH CAPITAL.

The cash capital of a commercial firm, whose business comprehends the purchase of cotton upon commission and the buying of bills of exchange upon domestic and foreign places, upon which said bills of exchange and cotton they draw and sell their own bills of exchange, is that much cash in gold or silver ready at hand in the strong box to be paid out for cotton purchased on commission or in the purchase of bills of exchange; and this cash capital comes under the description of personal estate. St. John v. City of Mobile, 21 Ala. 224, 226.

CASH CONTRIBUTION.

Where, on the formation of a limited partnership, the special partner gave his certified check, which was deposited to the credit of the new firm, and then the firm gave him its check for a part thereof, appearing to his credit on the books of a former firm composed of the same members, it was not an actual "cash contribution," and such partner was liable as a general partner. Lineweaver v. Slagle, 64 Md. 465, 2 Atl. 693, 54 Am. Rep. 775. The payment to the general partnership must be unrestricted, unqualified, in good faith, and left absolutely subject to the risks of the business; and, however the special partner may have acquired the money he contributes, if it is obtained by a contrivance to evade the statute, and if he depletes the firm's assets by his method of procuring it, the means used by him are at once of the greatest consequence. Moorhead v. Seymour, 77 N. Y. Supp. 1050, 1061.

CASH ENTRY.

"Cash entry," when applied to the purchase of land from the government, means the purchase of land at the government price. It is simply a cash transaction, and requires no affidavit of settlement, residence, or cultivation, or of nonalienation. Fideler v. Norton, 30 N. W. 128, 136, 4 Dak. 258.

CASH MARKET VALUE.

In proceedings for condemnation of land for a right of way, an instruction defining "cash market value" as the price which the owner, if desirous of selling, would under ordinary circumstances surrounding the sale of property have sold the property for, and a person desirous of purchasing the property would under such circumstances have paid for it, means the fair cash market value; and the fair cash value and the actual cash value mean the same thing, and both mean the fair or reasonable cash price for which property can be sold in the market. Conness v. Indiana, I. & L. R. Co., 193 Ill. 464, 474, 62 N. E. 221 (citing Birmingham Fire Ins. Co. v. Pulver, 126 Ill. 329, 18 N. E. 804, 9 Am. St. Rep. 598).

CASH NOTES.

A promise to pay in cash notes is not a promise to pay the nominal amount in money. Ward v. Lattimer, 2 Tex. 245, 248.

CASH ON HAND.

"Cash on hand," as used in Revision 1875, tit. 12, c. 5, § 6, requiring the payment by railway companies of a tax upon the valuation of its property after deducting the cash on hand, etc., means "ready money, or that which in ordinary business usage is the same thing. Bank notes, checks, drafts, bills of exchange, certificates of deposit, or other like instruments, which pass with or without indorsement from hand to hand as money, or are immediately convertible into money, fall properly enough within the words 'cash on hand.' Loans to other railroads on long time, stock of other companies not intended to be sold, and other investments of like kind, are clearly not cash on hand. 'Cash on hand' means money at hand ready to be used; actual cash or its equivalent, and actually on hand." State v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co., 22 Atl. 765, 767, 60 Conn. 328.

CASH PAYMENT.

See "Actual Cash Payment."

A cash payment in ordinary parlance is understood, in contradistinction to a credit payment, and there is no more reason for supposing that a cash payment is to be paid in money than that a deferred or credit payment is to be paid in money when due. Foley v. Mason, 6 Md. 37, 51.

CASH POLICY.

A stock policy of insurance must not be confounded with a cash policy. They are essentially different. The payment of a cash premium does not decide the character of a policy, as to whether it is mutual or stock. A mutual company may insure for either note or cash, and so may a stock company. A stock policy is issued solely upon the credit of the capital stock of the company to one who may be an entire stranger to the corporation. Given v. Rettew, 29 Atl. 708, 704, 162 Pa. 638.

CASH PREMIUM PLAN.

On the cash premium plan, on which loans are made to members of a building and loan association, a certain amount of money is advanced to the borrower as a loan upon his taking the requisite number of shares in the association, on which he pays a certain amount each month as interest on the whole loan, a certain amount each month as premium, and a certain amount each month as dues on his shares. The borrower each month pays, in addition to the interest on the money borrowed and the amount due upon his shares, a further sum in cash, called a "cash premium," in the nature of a bonus. Such an agreement is made upon the implied condition that the association shall remain a going concern. Curtis v. Granite State Provident Ass'n, 36 Atl. 1023, 1024, 69 Conn. 6, 61 Am. St. Rep. 17.

CASH PURCHASE.

A cash purchase is a payment of the purchase money and a delivery of the thing purchased. Powell v. Dayton, S. & G. R. R. Co., 12 Pac. 665, 667, 14 Or. 356.

CASH SALE.

In common ordinary popular acceptance of the language, a direction to sell for cash is a clear and unqualified direction not to sell or pass title to the goods without cash in hand. A sale for cash means that the money shall be paid when the title to the property passes. Hall v. Storrs, 7 Wis. 253, 259.

A sale for cash is a sale for money in hand, and on such sale the owner is not bound to deliver the goods until the price is paid. Steward v. Scudder, 24 N. J. Law (4 Zab.) 96, 101.

A cash sale is a sale for the money in hand. Dazet v. Landry, 30 Pac. 1064, 1068, 21 Nev. 291.

The term "cash sale" means a sale for cash, in contradistinction to a sale on credit. It means a sale in which the price is immediately paid. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. v. Lehigh Coal Navigation Co., 36 Pa. (12 Casey) 204, 210.

The expressions "cash," "cash down," or "cash on delivery," as used in sales, may be used in two different senses—one where the words indicate simply that the goods must be paid for before the buyer is entitled to possession, and the other where they indicate an intention not to part with the title until the price is paid. A cash sale is not necessarily, in law, either a conditional or unconditional sale. If by the use of these terms the parties understand merely that no credit is to be given, and the seller will insist on his right to possession until the payment of the price, the sale is so far complete and absolute that the property passes; but if it is understood that the goods are to remain the property of the seller until the price is paid the sale is conditional, and the title does not pass. Austin v. Welch, 72 S. W. 881, 883, 31 Tex. Civ. App. 526 (citing Scudder v. Bradbury, 106 Mass. 422; Towne v. Davis, 66 N. H. 396, 22 Atl. 450).

As affected by custom.

The term "cash sale," within the meaning of a direction to a factor to sell produce for cash, renders the factor liable for a loss resulting from his act in permitting a purchaser to take away the produce without paying the money at the time, even although there is a usage among factors of allowing purchasers a week or fortnight to pay when the sale has been for cash. Barksdale v. Brown, 1 Nott & McC. 517, 522, 9 Am. Dec. 720.

Where a factor, having orders to sell goods for cash, sold and delivered to a person in good credit, and the next day sent a bill to the purchaser for the price, which was not paid, it was held that the sale, being according to usage, was a sale for cash, and that the factor, even if he had the right, was not bound to receive such part of the goods as remained unsold by the purchaser. Clark v. Van Northwick, 18 Mass. (1 Pick.) 343, 344.

A sale for cash or a sale, which is called a "cash transaction," the term being interpreted in the sense in which the merchants of St. Louis use it, is something different from a sale of goods to be paid for on delivery. The interpretation put on the phrase "a cash transaction" or "a cash sale" by the course of dealings in St. Louis demonstrates that often what is thus characterized repudiates the idea of payment at the time when the goods come to the possession of the purchaser. It is quite consistent with the definition practically given to this phrase that an interval of 30 days may elapse between delivery and payment, and yet the transaction be called and recognized by every one as a cash transaction. St. Louis Type Foundry v. Union Printing & Publishing Co., 3 Mo. App. 142, 149.

A cash sale is a sale for a sum of money actually paid at the time of the sale, and proof that custom sales on a credit of 30 days were ordinarily called and regarded as cash sales will not be allowed to alter the meaning of the term. In this connection the court says: "We know that usage and custom will accomplish almost anything, except impossibilities, but when it proposes to change the intent of language it does not thereby change the nature of things. If any term of credit is not credit, then no term of credit is credit, and the very import of the term is abolished and expunged, and the thing becomes impossible." Chapman v. Devereux, 32 Vt. 616, 622.

A cash sale is one wherein the money is paid when the property is delivered. It cannot be contended that a sale for cash is a sale on credit of a week or ten days, nor can a duty to sell for cash be satisfied by a sale on a short credit, as a week or ten days, by a common custom of merchants so to dispose of goods sent them for sale. Bliss v. Arnold, 8 Vt. 252, 255, 30 Am. Dec. 467.

Where a declaration stated that plaintiff agreed to employ defendant as a coal factor, and that defendant promised the plaintiff that he would not sell "otherwise than for ready money," an alleged breach was not sustained by evidence for sale at two months' credit under a letter by plaintiff to defendant containing the following instruction: "Please sell me 250 tons at such price as will realize me not less than 15s. per ton net cash, less your commission for such sale." Boden v. French, 10 C. B. 886.

As authorizing credit.

A sale of property for cash means that the money shall be paid down when the title to the property passes, and a sale and delivery for a bank check payable the next day is not a sale for cash. Hall v. Storrs, 7 Wis. 253.

Under authority to sell goods for cash or not on credit, a sale to a person who promised to pay for them within a few days is not a sale for cash. Catlin v. Smith, 24 Vt. 85, 86.

Where one ordered to sell goods for cash sells them to one in good credit, expecting payment within a week, it was no violation of orders. Clark v. Van Northwick, 18 Mass. (1 Pick.) 343.

A positive direction to convert property assigned into "cash" as soon as possible, and upon the best terms possible, can hardly be construed into a discretionary authority to sell on credit, without doing violence to the well-established rule that power to sell on credit will not be inferred from language susceptible of a different construction. Muller v. Norton, 10 Sup. Ct. 147, 132 U. S. 501, 33 L. Ed. 397.

When a commission merchant is directed to "sell for cash," he cannot sell and deliver the goods, and wait a week or ten days for the price, though such is the custom among such merchants. "In all sales for cash the money must be paid when the property is delivered." Bliss v. Arnold, 8 Vt. 252, 255, 30 Am. Dec. 467.

The word "cash" may be employed at all times as a synonym of money in general.

But Webster declares that primarily it means ready money—money in your chest or in your hand. Where a person, by expression or limitation, stipulates for cash, he reserves the right to collect his money at will; and where persons have actually settled upon a definite period, however short, during which payment may be withheld, the sale is not for cash. De Laume v. Agar, McGloin, 97, 105.

CASH SURRENDER VALUE.

The term "cash surrender value," in Bankr. Act 1898, § 70a (Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, 30 Stat. 565, 566 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3451]), providing that, when any bankrupt shall have any insurance policy which has a cash surrender value payable to himself, his estate or personal representatives, he may pay or secure to the trustee the sum so ascertained and stated, and continue to hold such policy free from the claims of creditors, "has a defined and legal meaning, namely, the cash value, ascertainable by known rules, of a contract of insurance, abandoned and given up by the owner having contract right to do so. The surrender of the proviso is not the subject of negotiation or agreement, but of right. The proviso does not include those policies where the right of surrender is not given by the contract." In re Welling (U. S.) 113 Fed. 189, 192, 51 O. C. A. 151.

CASH VALUE.

See "Actual Cash Value"; "Estimated Cash Value"; "Fair Cash Value"; "Full Cash Value."

The cash value of an article is measured by the amount of cash into which it can be converted. State v. Central Pac. Ry. Co., 10 Nev. 47, 48, 68.

An estimate of homestead property as being of the "cash value" of three thousand dollars is equivalent to the requirement of the statute that the estimation be of the "actual cash value," as the "value" of a tract of land is its true and absolute value. The value is its actual existing value as opposed to its potential or possible value. Read v. Rahm, 4 Pac. 111, 112, 65 Cal. 343.

In tax law.

"Cash value," as used in the statute of California declaring that real estate shall be assessed at its cash value, means the amount at which the property would be appraised if taken in payment of a just debt due from an insolvent debtor. Huntington v. Central Pac. R. Co. (U. S.) 12 Fed. Cas. 974, 976; County of Cochise v. Copper Queen Consol. Min. Co. (Ariz.) 71 Pac. 946, 949.

By the express provisions of Tax Law, § 53, the words "cash value," as used in such act, means the usual selling price at the place where the property to which such term is applied shall be at the time of assessment, being the price which could be obtained therefor at private sale, and not at forced or auction sale. State Board of Tax Com'rs v. Holliday, 49 N. E. 14, 17, 150 Ind. 216, 42 L. R. A. 826.

The expression "cash value," as used in a direction to assessing officers, means the same thing as salable value and actual value. Cummings v. Merchants' Nat. Bank, 101 U. S. 153, 162, 25 L. Ed. 903.

The words "cash value," whenever used in the act relating to the collection of taxes, shall be held to mean the usual selling price at the place where the property to which the term is applied shall be at the time of assessment, being the price which could be obtained therefor at private sale, and not at forced or auction sale. Comp. Laws Mich. 1897, § 3850.

CASHIER.

See "Cash."

As trustee of an express trust, see "Express Trust."

A "cashier" is defined to be one who has charge of money, or who superintends the books, payments, and receipts of a bank or moneyed institution. His actual powers and duties, like those of all other agents, must be more or less qualified, restricted, or enlarged by the corporation, institution, or party for whom he acts. Sturges v. Bank of Circleville, 11 Ohio St. 153, 167, 78 Am. Dec. 296.

The cashier "is the executive officer of a bank, who transacts its business under the orders and supervision of the board of directors. He is their arm in the management of its financial operations." Martin v. Webb, 3 Sup. Ct. 428, 433, 110 U. S. 7, 28 L. Ed. 49; Luna v. Mohr, 1 Pac. 860, 868, 3 N. M. (Johns.) 56.

The inherent duties of a cashier of a bank are superintendence of the books and of the payments and receipts of the bank, to take charge of the notes, securities, and other funds of the bank, and of the business of negotiating, managing, and disposing of them, the superintendence of the collection of protested notes, the receipt of all moneys and notes of the bank, the giving up of discounted notes and securities when paid, the drawing of checks to withdraw funds of the bank on deposit elsewhere, and as executive officer the transaction of most of the business of the bank. The cashier is the principal officer of a bank, and is properly the executive agent of the directors. Sturges v. Bank of Circleville, 11 Ohio St. 153, 167, 78 Am. Dec. 296, 3 Am. Law Rev. 617.

"A cashier of a bank is held out to the public as having authority to act according to the general usage, practice, and course of business conducted by such institutions, and his acts done in the scope of such usage, practice, and course of business will, in general, bind the bank in favor of third persons possessing no other knowledge. Such an officer is, virtute officii, intrusted with the notes, securities, and other evidence of the bank, and is held out to the world by the bank as its general agent for the transaction of its affairs, within the scope of authority vested by such usage, practice, and course of business. Where the by-laws of a bank require that the transfer of the shares of the capital stock shall be entered in the books of the bank, the entry is usually made by the cashier. Official acts may be performed by the cashier which constitute the ordinary and customary functions of such an officer, and the persons dealing with the bank are warranted in believing that the cashier is duly authorized to perform any customary duty falling within the scope of that category, and may to that extent hold the bank responsible as if he was so authorized, however the fact may be, save only in cases where his want of authority is affirmatively proved, and actual knowledge of that fact is brought home to the third party." Case v. Citizens' Bank of Louisiana, 100 U. S. 446, 454, 25 L. Ed. 695.

A cashier is the business officer of the bank, but only in the sense of one who transacts, and not one who regulates or controls, its affairs. His duty has reference to daily routine business, and not to matters involving discretionary authority, which belongs, unless delegated, to the board of directors. As has been quaintly said, they are the minds and he is the hands of the corporation. It will not be disputed that when a special authority is conferred upon him, or when he acts in conformity with a general usage or an established acquiescence of his board of directors, the bank will be responsible for such acts, though beyond the ordinary scope of his duties. Gray v. Farmers' Nat. Bank, 32 Atl. 518, 521, 81 Md. 631 (citing Chemical Nat. Bank v. Kohmer [N. Y.] 8 Daly, 530; United States v. City Bank, 62 U. S. [21 How.] 356, 16 L. Ed. 130).

The cashier of a bank is its general executive officer, whose place it is to manage all the affairs of the corporation not particularly committed to the directors. Such being his office in general, his acts will be binding upon the bank if within the general scope of the business of the bank, though the cashier may not in fact have power to act in some regards to which his authority apparently extends. First Nat. Bank of Birmingham v.

First Nat. Bank of Newport, 22 South. 976, 979, 116 Ala. 520.

The cashier of a bank is the executive officer, through whom the whole financial operations of the bank are conducted. He receives and pays out its moneys, collects and pays its debts, and receives and transfers its commercial securities. Tellers and other subordinate officers may be appointed, but they are under his direction,—as it were, the arms by which designated portions of his various functions are discharged. It is his duty to receive all the funds which come into the bank, and to enter them upon its books, and he has the authority to give certificates of deposit and other proper vouchers. Where the money is in the bank, he has the same authority to certify a check to be good, charge the amount to the drawer, appropriate it to the payment of the check, and make the proper entry on the books of the bank. This he is authorized to do virtute officii. Merchants' Nat. Bank v. State Nat. Bank, 77 U. S. (10 Wall.) 604, 650, 19 L. Ed. 1008 (cited in Ellis v. First Nat. Bank, 48 Atl. 936, 938, 22 R. I. 565); Rosenberg v. First Nat. Bank (Tex.) 27 S. W. 897, 898. See, also, Commonwealth v. Reading Sav. Bank, 133 Mass. 16, 22, 43 Am. Rep. 495; Asher v. Sutton, 1 Pac. 535, 537, 31 Kan. 286. The cashier of a bank is the executive officer or agent of the financial department of the bank, and in all the duties imposed on him by law or usage as such cashier he acts and speaks for the bank. Ellicott v. Barnes, 1 Pac. 767, 768, 31 Kan. 170. The cashier of a bank is judicially defined to be an executive officer by whom its debts are received and paid, and its securities taken and transferred, and whose acts, within the ordinary course of his duties as such cashier, are binding on the bank. Bank of Commerce v. Hart, 55 N. W. 631, 632, 37 Neb. 197, 20 L. R. A. 780, 40 Am. St. Rep. 479.

The duties of a cashier of a bank are strictly executive. He is properly the executive agent of the board of directors, to carry out what it devises as to the management of the business of the bank. There are certain functions which, by long and universal usage, have come to be recognized as belonging to the office of cashier. They are inherent in the office, and unless restricted or enlarged they, and they only, can be performed by him by virtue of his appointment. Taylor v. Commercial Bank, 66 N. E. 726, 727, 174 N. Y. 181, 62 L. R. A. 783, 95 Am. St. Rep. 564 (citing American Surety Co. v. Pauly, 18 Sup. Ct. 552, 170 U. S. 133, 42 L. Ed. 977).

"Cashier," as used to define an officer of a bank, is the officer who, by virtue of his office, is generally intrusted with the notes, securities, and other funds of the bank, as its general agent in the negotiation, management, and disposal of them. Prima facie, therefore, he must be deemed to have authority to transfer and indorse negotiable securities held by the bank for its use and in its behalf. Wild v. Bank of Passamaquoddy (U. S.) 29 Fed. Cas. 1215, 1216.

The authority of the cashier of a bank to receive money and issue certificates of deposit therefor seems to be implied by the very name of his office. So that where a receipt or certificate is signed by him it must, in the absence of proof to the contrary, be taken to be the act of the bank. Abbott v. Jack, 69 Pac. 257, 258, 136 Cal. 510.

The word "cashier," in a designation of the ownership of stock upon the books of a bank as in the name of another person as "cashier" of another bank, suggests a qualified or representative holding, which puts all persons on inquiry, and the bank of which the holder is cashier is not estopped to show that it held the stock as collateral only. Frater v. Old Nat. Bank (U. S.) 101 Fed. 391, 42 C. C. A. 133.

The term "cashier," as used in Code Civ. Proc. § 5421, subd. 5, requiring a writ of attachment on a foreign corporation to be served on the president of the corporation, or the secretary, cashier, or other managing agent thereof, does not include a clerk employed in the store of a foreign mining corporation, although he has the custody of money belonging to the corporation, and keeps the accounts of and pays the men employed in the mine of the corporation. Blanc v. Paymaster Min. Co., 30 Pac. 765, 767, 95 Cal. 524, 29 Am. St. Rep. 149.

An employé of a state insurance agent, who is given the title "cashier," is not thereby impliedly authorized to indorse and discount drafts in the name of his principal. Exchange Bank v. Thrower, 45 S. E. 316, 317, 118 Ga. 433.

CASHIER'S CHECK.

A "cashier's check," so called, differs radically from an ordinary check. The latter is merely a bill of exchange drawn by an individual on a bank payable on demand; or, in other words, it is an order upon a bank purporting to be drawn upon a deposit of funds for the payment of a certain sum of money to a person named or to order or bearer on demand. As between himself and the bank the drawer of the check has the power of countermanding his order of payment at any time before the bank has paid it or committed itself to pay it. A cashier's check is of an entirely different nature. It is a bill of exchange drawn by the bank upon itself, and is accepted by the act of issuance, and, of course, the right of countermand as applied to ordinary checks does not exist as to it. Drinkall v. Movius State Bank, 88 N. W. 724, 726, 11 N. D. 10, 57 L. R. A. 341, 95 Am. St. Rep. 693.

CASK.

Any cask, see "Any."

"Casks," as used in a charter party providing for the bringing of a cargo of molasses from Cuba, and that the charterers were to pay a certain amount for hogsheads of 110 gallons, gross gauge, of casks delivered, means casks actually brought into port, whether such casks contained any molasses or not, provided the loss of the molasses was caused by dangers incident to the voyage, and was not due to the negligence of the master or crew of the vessel. The Cuba (U. S.) 6 Fed. Cas. 935.

Half barrel.

Wherever the term "barrel" or "cask of flour" is used in the chapter relating to inspections, it shall be construed to include a half barrel, unless the same be repugnant to the enactment. Code N. C. 1883, § 3020.

CAST.

See "Votes Cast."

The definition of "cast," as given by Webster, is to form into a particular shape by pouring liquids into a mold. The Century Dictionary defines it as that which is formed by founding; anything shaped in, or as if in, a mold. Where iron in ore is reduced to a metallic sponge, or pasty mass, and in that condition delivered from the furnace, and then, by a second operation, melted and run into molds, it is clearly a "cast" steel. Gary v. Cockley (U. S.) 65 Fed. 497, 501.

CAST AWAY.

"Cast away," as used in Act Cong. March 26, 1804, § 2 (2 Stat. 290), providing that if any person on the high seas shall willfully and corruptly cast away, burn, or otherwise destroy any ship or vessel of which he is owner in part or in whole, or in any wise procure the same to be done, with intent or design to prejudice any person that has underwritten any policy of insurance thereon, shall be punished, etc., means such an act as causes a vessel to perish or be lost, so as to be irrecoverable by ordinary means, and is synonymous with "destroy," which means to unfit a vessel for service beyond the hope of recovery by ordinary means. "'Destroy' is a generic term, 'cast away' is a species of destroying, as burning is." United States v. Johns (U. S.) 26 Fed. Cas. 616, 620.

Where a hole was bored in the bottom of a vessel so as to render it necessary to abandon her, and she was left on the high seas completely waterlogged, beyond the power of the vessel into which the captain and crew were taken to save her, and filling with such rapidity as to render her loss almost certain, it was a "casting away," within Act Cong. March 26, 1804, punishing such an act. United States v. Van Ranst (U. S.) 28 Fed. Cas. 360.

CAST OF SCULPTURE.

In the technical or professional sense, a "cast of sculpture" is one taken from an original creation in clay, as part of the process of making the completed statue in bronze or marble. In a broader sense the term embraces casts from sculptured objects in marble or bronze which reproduce the original objects. Benziger v. United States (U. S.) 107 Fed. 257, 258.

CASTIGATORY.

A "castigatory" was an instrument of punishment known to the ancient common law, by which a woman convicted of being a common scold was punished by being plunged into the water. "Lord Coke says that in law it signifieth a stool that falleth down into a pit of water for the punishment of the party in it." United States v. Royall (U. S.) 27 Fed. Cas. 907, 908.

CASTING VOTE.

"By a 'casting vote' is meant one which is given when the assembly is equally divided, and when the question pending is in such a situation that a vote more on either side will cast the preponderance on that side and decide the question accordingly, and not merely a vote which, if given on one side, will produce an equal division of assembly and thereby prevent the other side from prevailing. This principle extends to cases of election by ballot. In these cases the speaker does not vote by ballot, but waits until the votes are reported, and then votes orally, not for whom he pleases, but for one, or for the requisite number of candidates voted for who have received an equal number of votes. This principle applies equally in those cases where a less number than a majority is permitted, or a greater is required, to decide the question in the affirmative. Thus, if one-third only is permitted or required, and the assembly on a division stands exactly one-third to two-thirds, there is then occasion for the giving of a casting vote, because the presiding officer can then, by giving his vote, decide the question either way." Cush. Law & Prac. Leg. Assem. § 306. Thus, under the provisions of a city charter authorizing the common council to designate by vote two official newspapers, and providing that no member of either branch of the council shall vote for more than one, and requiring both papers to be selected on one ballot, the mayor, who has the right of casting a tie vote in the case of a tie, may, when three papers receive the same number of votes, vote for two of the papers. Wooster v. Mullins, 30 Atl. 144, 145, 64 Conn. 340, 25 L. R. A. 694.

The words "casting vote" in Waterville city charter, providing that the mayor shall preside in the board of aldermen and joint meeting of the two boards, but shall have only a casting vote, means a vote to be thrown by the mayor as presiding officer when the votes cast by the members are equally divided. The provision does not authorize the mayor to vote, when there is not a tie, for the purpose of making a tie. Brown v. Foster, 33 Atl. 662, 663, 88 Me. 49, 31 L. R. A. 118.

By common law a "casting vote" sometimes signifies the single vote of a person who never votes, except in case of a tie, and sometimes the double vote of a person who first votes with the rest, and then, upon an equality, creates the majority by giving a second vote. St. (4th Ed.) 1179, § 1, relative to religious corporations, and providing that no board of trustees shall be competent to transact any business unless the rector, if there be one, or at least one of the churchwardens, be present, and that such rector, if there be one, and, if not, then the churchwarden present, shall be called to the chair and shall preside and have the casting vote, does not mean that the chairman shall have the casting vote only in case of a tie arising on the votes of the other members, but authorizes the chairman, after having first voted with the rest, upon a tie occurring, to give a second vote. People v. Church of the Atonement (N. Y.) 48 Barb. 603, 606.
